Double jeopardy.

It refers to the traditional right of citizens not to be tried more than once on the same set of charges and, especially, the right not be tried again after being found innocent.

It's a phrase that smells of raids in the middle of the night, show trials, the sledgehammer tactics of authoritarian regimes around the world.

There's a good reason why double jeopardy carries the odour of authoritarianism. A regime with an unsavory political agenda could dissuade opponents by bringing charges against them over and over again, regardless of the findings of its own courts. It could do so until it secured a verdict more to its liking or until it wrung a plea of guilty from the exhausted victim.

It doesn't happen just in faraway places. It's happening here and now.

In 1979, a searching five-day trial ended in the acquittal of The Body Politic of charges laid after a police raid on the magazine's office. But Ontario Attorney General Roy McMurtry didn't like the verdict. So he just asked the courts to do him a favour, cancel the verdict and order a new trial.

The courts obliged. And people were shocked. They knew you could appeal a guilty verdict; that's all part of giving the accused the benefit of the doubt. But appeal an acquittal? It seemed to fly in the face of justice.

But that's what double jeopardy is all about. It contravenes our sense of justice, but there's no law to stop it from happening in Canada whenever an attorney general feels the itch.

And there's no doubt McMurtry and his cabinet colleagues, including Premier Bill Davis, are feeling the itch, especially where gay people are concerned. In the past two years, they've refused to extend human rights protections to include us, ignored police intervention against a gay candidate in Toronto's municipal elections, financed an extensive spy network in the city's gay community and okayed the brutal raids on our baths. An unsavory political agenda indeed.

On May 31, the second trial of The Body Politic begins. The defence at the first trial — which cost more than $30,000 — was entirely financed by people who were angered by the campaign against this magazine. The second trial won't cost as much, but it still won't be cheap. We need your help to win again.

In the game of double jeopardy, they may set the rules, but we can still win. Make your contribution today.

Oppressive habits

Re: John Allec's "No More Guilt! A Tour of the Territory of Perpetual Indulgence" (TBP, March):

Recently the "Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence" have received a sizable amount of coverage in the Gay press, both in the western United States and now in Canada. To date, however, the other side of the picture has not been presented.

Although I can write only from the San Francisco experience of these "male nuns," I imagine that the situation in Canada is not that different. I must also point out that the context in which I write is that of a Gay man, Christian, Gay Liberationist and Feminist-Socialist.

That the soi-disant "Sisters" are a group of men is so self-evident that its import is very likely to be discounted. Nonetheless, that is the heart of the problem. As a group of men, the "Sisters" trivialize a group of women (nuns). Likewise, by the particular form of their "drag," they trivialize those transpersons (transsexuals and transvestites) who cross-dress out of a genuine self-identity. As Gay people we are all too well aware that to trivialize is to oppress: all of the "fag" and "dyke" jokes, the "sissy" and "tomboy" epithets, "Little Black Sambo," "Frito Bandito," "Sister Hysterectomy" present us with just a few examples.

As a Christian Gay man and priest, I would be the very last to argue that organized religion has not been a major historic source of gay oppression. However, what we see in the "Sisters," despite their contrary claims, is not a depotentiating of that oppression, but men who stand with the oppressor by continuing to oppress women and transpersons by trivialization — and all in the name of "justice." That is what makes it truly insidious and what calls us to openly oppose it.

The "Sisters" not only reify the ancient oppression of man over woman. They also give assent to their and our own oppression by reinforcing the misogynistic attitudes and male-chauvinist structures which are the roots of anti-Gay oppression.

As one who has been privileged to know such saintly nuns as Mother Teresa of Calcutta and others in the peace and civil rights struggles over the years — many of whom I've been arrested with in civil disobedience from time to time — I find the "Sisters" mockery of nuns to be particularly insensitive. If they truly believe they "present the inner, personal reality of spirituality" (as "Sister Adi" said in an interview recently), this may, in their minds, conform to their earlier claim that they are "a neo-pagan earth religion to dispel guilt and spread joy" (as one of their number proclaimed from the platform at the 1980 Harvey Milk Memorial in San Francisco). In a pluralistic society such as ours is intended to be, that is certainly their right. However, if they are sincere in those claims, it would seem that there is no reason for them to take the sacred habit of Christian nuns and make mock of it. If they truly perceive themselves to have their own "spiritual path," they should pursue that rather than attacking other people's faith!

I would like the record to show that there are those of us in the Gay Community — Christian and non-Christian alike — who not only are not amused by the antics of the "Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence," but are deeply offended by their reactionary and oppressive trivialization of women, transpersons and nuns.

Politics first

I noted with some dismay that I was quoted in a news article in the last issue ("Rural Outreach," TBP, April) as saying, "Politics is getting people up off their asses" and, "The important thing is to put politics last."

Aside from the fact that these two statements appear to be mutually contradictory, I admit to uttering the first, but deny, or at least don't recall, uttering the second. If I did say it, it was certainly taken out of context.

What I recall saying was this: When an organizer goes into a small town or city to organize, he or she is dealing with gay people to whom dancing with a member of the same sex or holding hands without fear of physical violence is a revolutionary activity. Getting such people together for a meeting where they can talk about being gay on a level other than the immediately sexual is a major step forward in building a community, because in these places contact between gay people is so infrequent that when it does take place it is usually for nothing more than immediate sexual gratification. Sexual gratification is wonderful, but not enough. The point of grassroots organizing is to encourage people to build a community of shared goals and values.

An organizer cannot go into a region where gay life is underdeveloped and begin by insisting that people march down Main Street carrying banners and demanding sexual orientation protection from town hall. That kind of politics comes last, but it will come in time. The first and most important political activities are, as I mentioned above, the banal — holding hands, dancing, kissing, talking. Once people in small cities and towns become used to being able to do these things in a comfortable environment of their own making (socials, dances, meetings, rap sessions, parties), they will soon come to consider them as inalienable rights of affection — which they are. Once that realization is made it can only be a matter of time before some start the long march down Main Street. But to begin an organizing campaign with such exhortations would be a disaster. The first political step is, as I did say, getting people off their asses to begin realizing their power to do things for themselves.

"The battle for homosexual liberation is being fought, in terms of sheer numbers, on more fronts by males than by females."

I would never make a statement such as "Put politics last" except in a very specific context, or possibly if I were ascribing a very narrow meaning to the word "politics." As far as I am concerned politics comes first, and almost every human action, activity and behaviour is in some way political.

Disch and disbelief

I was disappointed to read the letter entitled "Deep Disch" (from Walter Phillips) in your March issue.

This is typical of the "ghettoization" mentality a lot of gays have. I think gays need exposure to all sides and points of view, and that this is an important part of liberating ourselves that is often overlooked. I did not come out as a gay individual just to be locked into a gay only approach. The type of soul-searching needed to find yourself as a gay person can raise your consciousness, but only if you are open-minded. Here's to more liberal input into liberation magazines!

*Jonathan Bowe
Baie D'Urfe, Quebec*

I hope that Thomas Disch (TBP, December 1981) is still serious about his Do You Still Believe in Santa Claus? A Young Person's Guide to Disbelief!

I used to believe in Santa Claus: the Roman Catholic Church. It took me over thirty years finally to overcome the effects of its propaganda.

Will the children of the Moral Majority grow up happier than many Catholics I know?

Better to differ?

Eve Zaremba laments that Gay Liberation is a male movement (TBP Letters, March) but does not attempt to say why this is so. Can it be that male homosexuals for the most part are the ones getting arrested and therefore testing the legal system; getting elected to official positions as openly homosexual individuals; dealing with police surveillance and harassment at numerous levels; launching and maintaining publications of international repute (some of which are journalistically excellent); fighting publicly in an organized fashion for dignity and recognition while being oppressed or victimized?

I could go on. The point is that the battle for homosexual liberation, and by this I mean the right to live and love as a homosexual individual, is being fought, in terms of sheer numbers, on more fronts by males than by females.

We are constantly hearing from female homosexuals about how different their goals, interests, politics, sexuality, etc are from those of males, and much less about areas where some of these things coincide. Many female homosexuals probably think that bath raids and washroom arrests have nothing to do with female homosexuality or behaviour. What they do have to do with is the right of consenting adults to engage in sexual activity of their own choosing free of police surveillance and harassment. That is human liberation.

The laws that these homosexual males are running up against could be applied to much of what goes on in the bedrooms of heterosexuals and female homosexuals if a police officer happened to be around. Each time a male homosexual wins a point in the battle against homophobia and oppression, he wins it as well for any female homosexual who could be victimized in similar circumstances.

Zaremba suggests it is "better to differ where we obviously differ and agree to work together freely where our interests coincide." What bothers me is the number of female homosexuals who are preoccupied with these differences, who refuse to "work together freely where our interests coincide." The homosexual community here in Vancouver is currently experiencing the fragmentation and disunity this creates.

As a female homosexual, I cannot forget that it was male homosexuals who helped me with their open friendliness when I was coming out. And I, for one, would not like to speculate on where homosexual liberation would be if they all suddenly disappeared.

Lastly, Zaremba suggests that TBP does not speak for her because "its content, choice of issues, presentation, emphasis, advertising policy do not represent my political or sexual orientation." This can also be said of almost all other newspapers, most of the literature written down through the ages, the bulk of the contents of the public library system and any other heterosexually-oriented media. Does she therefore read lesbian literature only?

I personally find TBP to be a refreshing escape from the persistent hetero suggestion that all I need to be fulfilled is a man and a baby.

Cold anger

"Angus Mackenzie's" article on fist-fucking has left me cold with anger.

I am not angry about fist-fucking in general. It is none of my business that two potentially pleasant people would care to inflict upon each other probable permanent physical damage.

I am not writing to complain that one less-than-large article would contain the terms: "noblesse," "class," "San Pellegrino," "simpatico," and "French nail-clipper" (all of this so "reefened" and non-U that the small hairs on the back of my neck are made to stand on end!).

What, in fact, is really so damned annoying about "Mr Mackenzie's" article is that Rick Bébout and the rest of the production gang had to waste several valuable hours throwing together such meaningless, poorly written drivel, inked by a bounder too cowardly to sign his real name.

Inaccuracies, innuendo

As a person who has, over the past half-dozen years, been a strong supporter of TBP (including resigning from the Ontario Arts Council because they refused to give TBP its recommended and well-deserved grant in 1978), I can only say how disappointed I am that TBP is guilty of the same biased reporting as the Globe and Mail was in its "backlash" article of February 25, 1982 (see "Article on local feuds sparks libel action," TBP, April).

Rather than contain what, in its own words, is a "tempest in a teapot," TBP's reporter promptly smashed the teapot, let the genie out of the bottle and created a whirlwind of useless and bitter debate and recriminations.

As the Globe and Mail article was a deliberate, unwarranted and unforgivably vicious attack on Peter Maloney and George Hislop, full of inaccuracies and innuendo, sleazily scissored and pasted together using highly provocative and out-of-context statements made by individuals in the gay community, so TBP's article was a deliberate, unwarranted and unforgivably vicious attack on those same individuals (presumably to "punish" them for having been "stupid" enough to trust the Globe and Mail's City Hall reporter).

Already victims of the Globe's journalistic "Pit," these individuals must now endure the injustice of TBP's slicing "Pendulum." A pox on both papers as far as I'm concerned! It is journalistic ethics and objectivity as well as the credibility of the reporters which is at stake here, and some very important principles are being jettisoned in the interests of good copy, scoring trite debating points or just simply getting even.

For example, when TBP called Doug Chin to ask him why he considers himself a "community organizer and youth worker," he told the reporter that he was trained at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute as a social worker with specialties in youth work and community organizations. He said that he worked with the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews as a delegate and youth worker; that he was President of the Canadian Chinese Association; that he was Chairman of the Steering Committee of a special City Hall Committee to look into the needs of Toronto's Chinese community; that he introduced the small group homes concept to Scarborough and was co-founder of Kennedy House for Boys there; that he was the founding President of the Chatsworth Charitable Foundation (charitable branch of the Community Homophile Association of Toronto), the founding President of Gays at Ryerson, the

Gay families for prisoners

I am an inmate at Indiana Reformatory, and I want to introduce you to our newly planned group "Gay Family for Prisoners."

For the past several weeks the administration here has been increasing pressure on and harassment of gay prisoners in such a way that we have no grounds for legal action.

What we hope to do is make contact with gays all over the US and Canada. We want to be able to exert public pressure when we need it. This can be done by mail if we are in contact with a large number of gays who are willing to voice their support by mail. We plan to develop an organization that can help gays all over by uniting into one voice.

There are groups that aid gay prisoners with legal actions, but most harassments we undergo are due to the negative attitude of the prison staff toward gays. Most gay prisoners are rejected by family and the public either because they have been incarcerated or because they are gay. So we have no one to whom we can protest our mistreatment. For this reason we are calling our group "Gay Family for Prisoners."

We ask each of your readers to write and make contact with us, so that we can depend on your help in the future.

"Rather than contain what, in its own words, is 'a tempest in a teapot', TBP promptly smashed the pot and created a whirlwind of useless and bitter recriminations."

founding President of the Tri-Aid Charitable Foundation and the founder and director of Canada's first gay group home, Tri-Aid House. TBP's reporter, however, anxious to discredit Mr Chin, makes no mention of any of this, but writes the following about him calling himself a community organizer: "He explains" (when he did no such thing!) "this means he has been on welfare for the last seven years because of ill health and that he does his work on a voluntary basis."

True, Mr Chin is not well, having suffered a heart attack in 1976 and having been given only a 50/50 chance of living through his open heart surgery in 1977. That same year, however, this workaholic, who suffered a heart attack at the age of 35, started Tri-Aid as "occupational therapy." He has worked with 50 young gay people through the Tri-Aid House residential programme and counselled over 300 others and, yes, collected about $2,600 medical welfare a year from the City for the past four years, since March 1978. (So much for accuracy and innuendo, and to think that TBP has Mr Chin's resumé on file from previous mailings!)

The reporter also wrote that Mr Chin "admitted" (when, again, he did no such thing!) that Tri-Aid has a "token" board of five persons. Tri-Aid no more has a "token" board than TBP has a "token" collective. Tri-Aid has had a total of 12 people on its board in the last five years: nine men, three women, some straight, some gay, some lesbians, seven of them in some way directly connected with social services and four of which were professionally trained social workers like Mr Chin. And that doesn't include half a dozen volunteers who worked on the Tri-Aid House project without sitting on the board.

The Globe and Mail article made Mr Chin out to be a "decent," "moderate" "homosexual" in bed with the police, which is not only hysterically funny considering his table-thumping gay militancy and sexual proclivities, but is certainly a measure of how skewed, inaccurate and unreal the Globe article was.

TBP has compounded that injury and magnified the distortion in the other direction by making him out as an insignificant, shiftless rabble-rouser in bed with the gay community's malcontents. Neither is accurate and neither is journalism!

*Karsten Kossman, Secretary,
The Tri-Aid Charitable Foundation
Toronto*

The collective responds:

Karsten Kossman may think Denys Horgan's article, "Backlash against militants forms among some gays," was an "unwarranted and unforgiveably vicious attack on Peter Maloney and George Hislop," but that wasn't Doug Chin's reaction when our reporter interviewed him in connection with our coverage. Chin never complained to us that he was either misquoted or quoted out of context. His concern at the time was to establish that the allegations he was reported to have made against Hislop were justified.

When asked about his role as a street worker and community organizer, Chin did indeed cite his qualifications, as outlined in Kossman's letter. He also said he was on welfare (he didn't say medical; he did say for seven years).

However, we were (and are) less concerned with his professional qualifications than with his accountability to the gay community; we asked about Tri-Aid's board because it seemed a likely mechanism for monitoring Chin's volunteer work. But rather than provide assurances, Chin noted that the same lack of concern for the needs of young gay people that had forced him to take on his street work voluntarily had also made it difficult to get members for the Tri-Aid board. "Token" was his adjective, meant, we assume, to convey that board membership is not an onerous commitment.

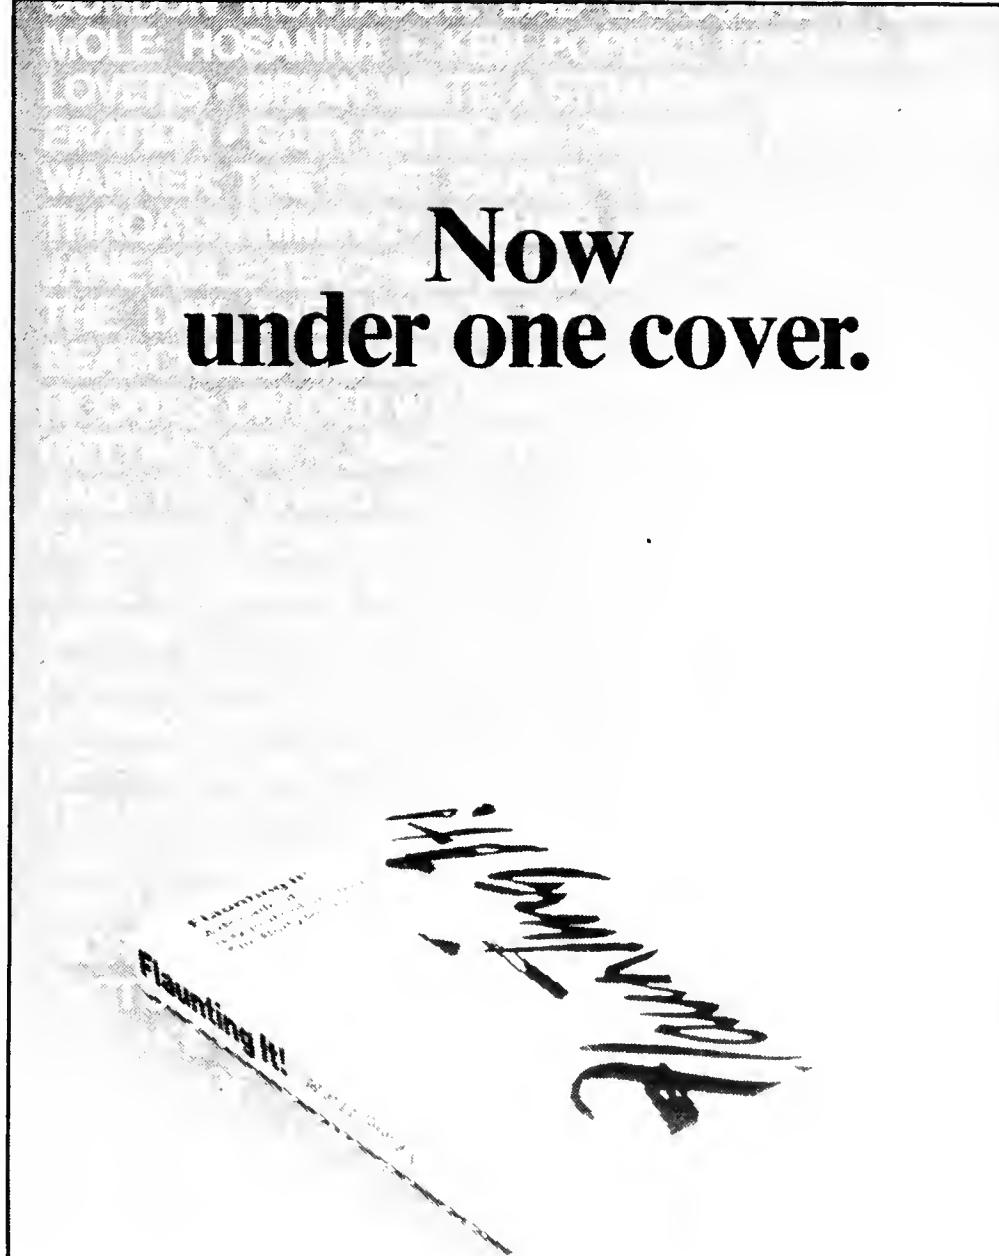

While, as Kossman states, Tri-Aid has had a dozen board members in the past five years, it now has five, including Kossman, Chin and Chin's mother. Gay community activist Tom Warner once agreed to sit on the Tri-Aid board, but later withdrew. At the time, he says, Chin's mother didn't attend meetings (though, as owner of the property where Tri-Aid operates, she had a number of proxy votes; who these proxies represented, Warner was never able to discover), and that the two other members of the board, in addition to Chin and Kossman, were a social worker who was a cousin of Chin's and another man who was said to have professional qualifications but was "too paranoid to come to meetings." Warner says he decided not to remain involved because this situation created problems with Tri-Aid's true accountability to the community.

Our article was not meant to be an attack on Doug Chin or on Tri-Aid, but the fact remains that Chin was quoted in Horgan's article as a credible voice representing the sentiments of at least a part of the gay community, and that this apparent credibility rests at least in part on his professional status. George Hislop, in the same article, said that while he supported the idea of gay-run social services for street youth, "I don't think he (Chin) is a good social worker.... I don't support the idea of him running it." Others may share these doubts, but there is no way, other than Tri-Aid's own accounts, of verifying and evaluating the work the organization does.

Karsten Kossman has indeed been a strong and welcome supporter of this magazine for many years. We remain grateful for that, but we cannot accept his portrayal of Doug Chin as both a seasoned social worker and gay militant (which he undoubtedly is) and a naive innocent in the hands of manipulative media. Mr Chin has lent the credibility of his position to "inaccuracies and innuendo, sleazily scissored and pasted together" in such a way as to undermine institutions and activists in the gay community. We feel we have a responsibility to point out that, despite his perceived position, he is not accountable to that community for either his actions or his words.

Gay in Asia: emotions and exploitation

Two articles have recently appeared in TBP dealing with homosexuality in Central Asia. The first, in September 1981, dealt with a report to the Third International Congress on Child Abuse and Neglect, which claimed that gay tourists were "exploiting" and "corrupting" local (Sri Lankan) boys. The second article, by Australian writer Peter Jackson in the January/February issue, detailed an encounter in Calcutta on New Year's Eve, 1981. I would like to outline my own experience with homosexuality in this part of the world, and in doing so I hope to expand upon some of Peter Jackson's remarks and clarify some of the misconceptions which may have arisen from the commentary of man/boy love in Sri Lanka.

In July 1980, at the age of eighteen, I began participating in an exchange programme called Canada World Youth. I was assigned a Sri Lankan partner, (aged twenty) and we lived and worked together for six months, half of which was spent on a dairy farm near Toronto and half with a family of rice farmers in Sri Lanka. When we met we knew only a few words of each other's language, and our knowledge of each other's cultural milieu was limited to a few inaccurate stereotypes. By January 1981, we could both converse in each other's language. While we certainly did not know all of the each other's cultural nuances, we both agreed that we knew each other better than either of us had ever known anyone.

One night, shortly after we first arrived in Sri Lanka, my partner and I were discussing Buddhism and Catholicism and their respective attitudes towards sex. My partner then, much to my surprise, asked, "You have sex sometimes with boys?" In a split second I tried to analyze what motivated my partner to ask the question; whether it was to confirm a rumour he had heard; whether it was because he found my attitudes towards sex so shocking that he figured my actions might meet even that level of perversity; whether he'd overheard a conversation between myself and another Canadian on the subject; or whether in fact he was simply curious. I tried to evade the question with a generalized answer that most Canadian boys do not; that many people think it is wrong but that I myself do not consider it wrong. At least, I hoped, I could gauge his reaction to that partial answer. The next night the question was again raised, this time with an additional inquiry as to why I did not answer him in a straightforward manner the first time.

Within a few minutes I had revealed that I not only had sex with boys sometimes, but regularly. I also introduced a new word into his English vocabulary: "gay." Far from being disgusted or shocked, my partner then asked if Tom, the guy I always seemed to be getting letters from, was my favourite "gay sex friend." Very curious by that point, I of course reversed the questioning.

The Spartacus International Gay Guide's contention that, until recently, a "positive healthy, loving attitude" existed in Sri Lanka in regard to homosexuality among adolescents is, quite simply, wrong. My partner has been an active homosexual since he was fourteen, and his tales of societal pressure against that tendency match the tales any Canadian might tell about being gay in the Fifties.

Three boys in his village, aged seventeen to twenty, were caught having a threesome by one of the boy's fathers. He proceeded to take them all, his son included, to the local police station. The police shaved their heads, bound them and led them through their village publicly denouncing their misdeeds. They were then released. They certainly did not interpret the subsequent atmosphere in their homes and schools to be a "loving, healthy" one. No Western, moralistic imperialists were responsible for that atrocity; my partner is from one of the most traditional villages in Sri Lanka.

Peter Jackson said much more which I would interpret as accurate. Marriages are generally arranged; my partner has known his future wife since the age of four. His homosexuality must remain "utterly separate from the social order and expectations that framed his life, that were, for him, reality."

However, "gay" is still more than just a Western concept. While in all likelihood my partner and his lover of six years will each marry his respective bride, he explained that they do indeed love each other very much and will be very sad when they must separate. This is much more than Peter Jackson's description of physical release. As far as I'm concerned, when a man's consciousness focuses on another man to the extent that love is created, that is "gayness" in its purest form. To avoid "gayness," homosexuality must occur in an emotional vacuum. While homosexuality does occur in Asia in the form of a strict physical release, especially amongst adolescents, gay people exist as well. My partner, who had never read a piece of literature dealing with homosexuality, estimated that as many as ten per cent of the boys he knew attached emotion to homosexual experiences.

The final point I wish to address, one of the main focuses of both TBP articles, is that of tourists' utilizing prostitutes in Third World countries. While I would not agree that all man/boy relationships are exploitative, I do feel that tourists who buy sex in Third World countries are exploiting their sexual partners.

Peter Jackson is correct when he points out that for most boys hustling in Asia, their bodies are their sole commodity. The Spartacus contention that "boys who became sexual companions of adults, even foreign adults... lived happily and proudly" offended me. I befriended boys who were homosexual prostitutes in both Columbo, Sri Lanka, and Bangkok, Thailand. For these boys, homosexuality is not "gayness" nor is it "physical release." It is not even a free choice, but a matter of survival.

When Westerners go to Asia looking for cheap prostitutes, they are engaging not only in economic exploitation, but in a destruction of the last remaining vestiges of pride which the Third World can rely on. Congratulations to Peter Jackson for touching on this issue of cultural sensitivity in a way few gay tourist have considered, and shame on Spartacus International for advocating an exploitative and damaging practice. □

Fighting city hall — and winning

It is a matter of speculation why 20 cub scouts who were attending an April 5 Kitchener city council meeting to learn about civic government were suddenly ushered out of the chambers as Greg Meadows of the Kitchener-Waterloo Gay Media Collective began to speak.

Collective members were at city hall to protest a ruling that they not be allowed to rent a municipally-owned building for a gay dance.

The collective approached the city's Department of Recreation April 1 to lease the pavilion in downtown Victoria Park for a June 4 dance. They were told that the pavilion was available for that date and received a standard rental contract the next day.

On the morning of April 5, however, collective member Joe Szalai received a phone call from a clerk who said that the pavilion was not available. Szalai was told that there had been problems with gay dances held a few years ago by the Riverside Social Club at the suburban Bridgeport Community Centre, where pressure from nearby residents led to cancellation of the dance permits. The problems at Bridgeport had involved straight thugs harassing patrons at the dances. Riverside organizers had met privately with Kitchener Mayor Morley Rosenberg to try to have the decision reversed, but were unsuccessful.

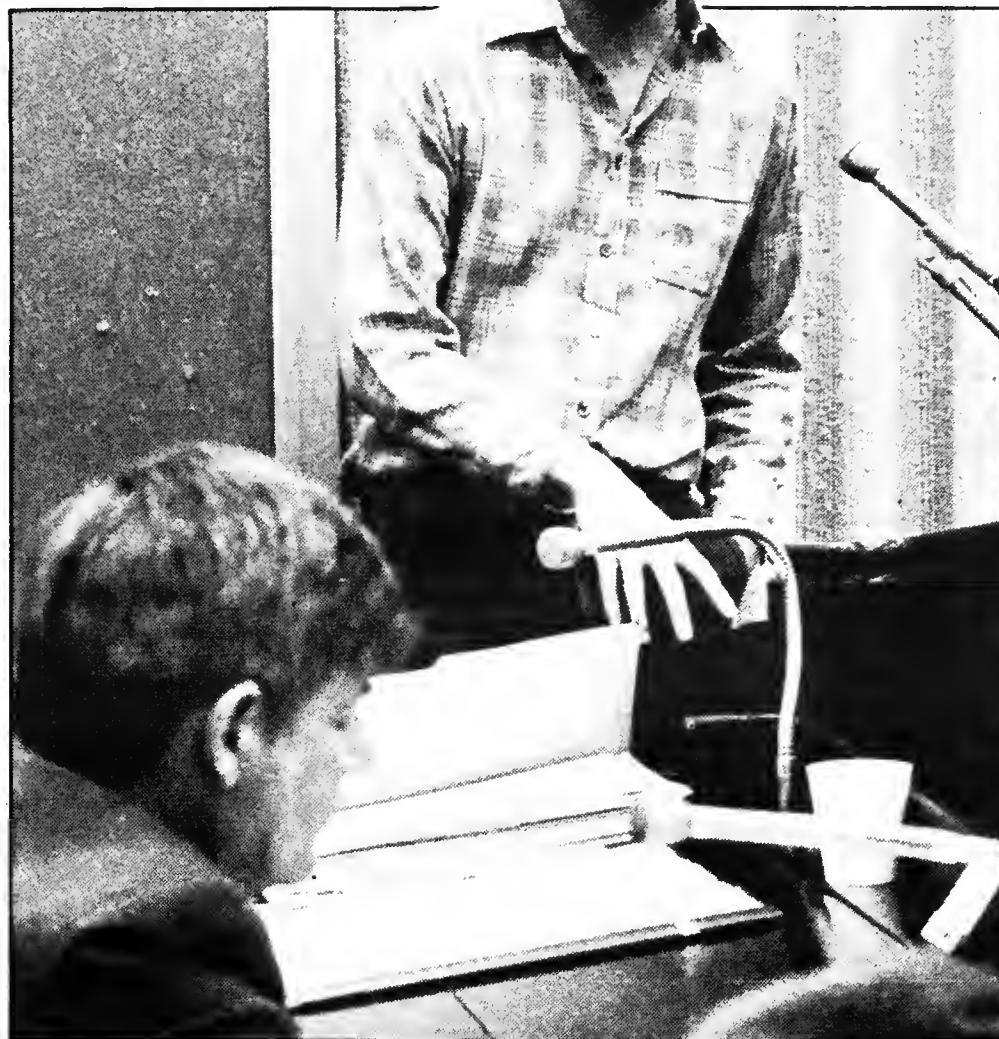

Szalai was in no mood for a private meeting. He immediately called the Kitchener-Waterloo Record. "I was furious," he said, "that, as a taxpayer, I was being denied use of a city facility. Using that logic, it was as if the city was telling me that what happened with one heterosexual group was reason enough for denying services to all heterosexual groups. That's clearly ridiculous. When applied to a minority like gays, it's clearly discriminatory."

The Record carried the story that day, which also happened to be a city council meeting day. The collective sent Szalai and Greg Meadows to council to demand an explanation.

Meadows presented the group's case before an attentive council and representatives of local news media. He demanded either a reversal of the decision or the resignation of two men apparently responsible for the discrimination — Director of Recreation Bob Arnot and Rick Antaya, a department supervisor.

Mayor Rosenberg admitted to council that he had personally intervened to stop the dance. He read a letter, addressed to Szalai, from the Recreation Department, outlining the reasons for the decision. The problems which plagued the Riverside Social Club dances figured prominently among the reasons. It immediately became clear that the mayor assumed the collective and the Riverside Social Club, which had sponsored the Bridgeport dances, were the same group. When Meadows made the point that there was no connection between the two, council's mood changed abruptly.

"Frankly, I don't see any reason to refuse them a permit," said Alderman Al Barron. Alderman Don Travers felt that the collective "should not be tarred with the same brush" as the social club, but rather be treated as any other new group.

Mayor Rosenberg sat quietly as council voted 9-3 in favour of granting the dance permit.

Szalai then took the podium and demanded that the city pass a bylaw prohibiting discrimination on the basis of "sex, colour, creed, religion, physical ability and sexual orientation so that all people have equal access to city jobs, services and facilities."

Alderman Judy Balmer responded by saying that she saw no discrimination in this case, and added that the collective should not generalize because of one "misunderstanding." She further stated that the question of human rights extends beyond municipal authority and bylaws. Alderman Will Ferguson asked that city solicitor Jim Wallace provide a report on the subject of human rights. Alderman Balmer supported the request.

According to Szalai, "The city is in a position to augment existing provincial and federal human rights laws, as have Toronto, Windsor and Ottawa, regarding sexual orientation for their own services. It is a city's prerogative to make contractual agreements between itself and its own citizens — in this case, an agreement prohibiting discrimination."

Meanwhile, organizers are continuing their planning for the June dance. The pavilion holds more than 200 people and a good turnout is expected. Funds raised will be used by the collective for its radio show, Gay News and Views, and for its forthcoming magazine, to be called Gay, eh?

Another park, another politician

TORONTO — Alderman John Sewell seems uncertain about supporting a Lesbian and Gay Pride Day Committee (LGPDC) request to use Grange Park for this year's June 27 celebration.

Sewell offered his support to the organizers February 16, but withdrew it soon after because he felt "that the proposed use is more regional than local in nature and thus would be better accommodated in a regional kind of park." He suggested Queen's Park. After receiving a number of calls and letters protesting this move, Sewell reversed his decision "with considerable reluctance," and is once again backing the use of Grange Park.

Tom Warner, speaking for the Toronto Gay Community Council (TGCC), says, "We're surprised that John Sewell would be putting forth that kind of position. It's something we would have expected from the more conservative elements on city council." The TGCC passed a motion March 24 supporting the LGPDC in its efforts to use Grange Park.

Last year's Pride Day festivities in Grange Park ran into difficulties when a few area residents complained about the noise level that evening. This prompted a discussion of the matter in a city Neighbourhoods Committee meeting and led to the establishment of a new rule requiring that future events in city parks be supervised to avoid such problems.

In a letter to the TGCC, Sewell explained that a "larger, more regional facility than Grange Park should be chosen (because) one does not manage to win friends by foisting on a community an event which is too large for the facility."

Warner says the size of the facility

"didn't pose any problems from our point of view." There were no more than about 700 people in the park at any one time, with plenty of room for more, according to Warner.

Kyle Rae of LGPDC scoffs at Sewell's concern that Grange Park is too small for the event planned. "John Sewell is playing games. He is manufacturing excuses for opposing the use of the park because he does not want to be seen to be aligned with the gay community," Rae told TBP.

Sewell was out of town when TBP tried to reach him for comment.

THE POLICE

Would-be killer finally locked up

TORONTO — A man who vowed to police that he was going to "kill a fag" every night until he had "cleaned up" the city has been sent to jail.

Describing Gordon Fudge, 29, as "a very dangerous man," County Court Judge Hugh Locke gave Fudge a five-year sentence April 18 after he pleaded guilty to a charge of possessing a weapon for a purpose dangerous to the public peace. The charge arose out of an incident which took place December 23, when Fudge went to a gay bar and met David Ratz, who invited him home. After the two men had sex, Fudge went to the kitchen, found a large butcher knife and returned with it to the bedroom. Ratz escaped unharmed to a next-door apartment and called police. Fudge was arrested in Ratz's apartment.

In a statement shortly after his arrest, Fudge declared, "I went to a fag hotel to kill as many fags as I could get. If I could kill one I could kill them all." Fudge said he hated homosexuals because he had been raped during a recent term in prison. Ironically, Fudge was himself serving time for rape (his victim was a woman); at the time of his December arrest he was on parole.

Fudge was kept in custody until February 3, when he appeared for a preliminary hearing before Provincial Court Judge June Bernhardt. The judge was not told of Fudge's damaging statements to police and the defendant's counsel asked for a show-cause hearing into his client's continued detention without benefit of a bail hearing. Before the day was out, he was released on bail of $15,000 on the condition that he stay away from gay bars.

Fudge's unexpected release sent ripples of fear through the gay community, and David Ratz went into hiding for fear of his life. Concern soon spread beyond the gay community. Officials of Attorney-General Roy McMurtry's office moved quickly when lawyer Peter Maloney informed them of the dangerous situation created by Fudge's release.

Before Fudge's preliminary hearing resumed February 4, he was re-arrested on a parole warrant. Judge Bernhardt heard a Crown application for detention and agreed that Fudge was a danger to the public and issued a detention order. As a result, the would-be killer remained in custody until his trial.

Gay Awareness 101?

TORONTO — A pilot project in gay awareness for police officers working in this city's 52 Division may be in the works. A committee composed of three police officers and three gays has been struck to draw up a curriculum for an experimental course. 52 Division was chosen because it is a downtown precinct with a large gay population and a history of abysmally poor relations between police and gay residents.

members were very conscious of the need to speak clearly and choose words carefully.

As far as the collective can tell, reaction from the local gay community has been quite favourable. The case opens the door to other gay groups in the city who might want to rent municipal facilities. And there is a feeling of pride in fighting city hall — and winning.

Cop probe: change

TORONTO — A consulting firm hired by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Commission has recommended far-reaching changes in the management of the police force.

In its report to the commission, made public April 8, the firm of Hickling-Johnston, Ltd pointed to a number of problem areas in the force, including shortcomings in relations with the public at large and with minority communities in particular, weaknesses in management and accountability, and an outdated paramilitary approach, especially on the part of senior officers.

The commissioners, of course, have heard all this before, but since the study carries a $400,000 price tag, the criticisms might hit home this time.

The report comes at a time when the reputation of the Metro Toronto police is in tatters, and pressures for change are at an all-time high.

March saw the arrest of two members of the Intelligence Bureau when the RCMP broke up an international drug-import conspiracy, and the charging of an officer from another unit with trafficking in narcotics.

On April 5, County Court Judge Joseph Kane convicted two police officers on charges of forcible confinement.

They had ordered two East Indian men into an unmarked squad car and driven them to a secluded area behind a sewage plant, where the men were slapped around and terrorized. While the officers have not yet been sentenced, the Crown has argued for a jail term on the grounds that anything less would cause a "public scandal."

Meanwhile, police are still smarting because allegations of systematic torture of suspects by members of the Holdup Squad have been turned over to the human rights organization, Amnesty International. Paul Walter, head of the police union, has retaliated by publishing the names of 71 Toronto criminal lawyers in the April issue of his association's publication, News and Views. The list of names carries a warning that the lawyers are "anti-police" and that officers should "be guided accordingly" in dealing with them. The lawyers all signed a petition to Amnesty asking it to investigate the torture charges.

For comic relief from the scandals, there has been the spectacle of internal police trials of officers for such crimes as, in one case, eating a pear while on duty and, in another case, for growing a moustache half-a-centimetre longer than regulations permitted. (The prosecutor in the moustache case said it constituted a "breakdown in discipline" which could lead to "chaos.")

After a month of public discussion and reaction, the police commission will consider which of the consultant's recommendations to implement, if any.

ON THE STREETS

Gay patrol: a different kind of streetwalking

TORONTO — With the smell of doggy-do in the air, the Toronto Gay Patrol (TGP) is once again intensifying its efforts to make downtown streets safe for lesbians and gay men. This does not mean a massive "Stoop and Scoop" campaign; rather, it is an effort to deal with a much more serious kind of shit, namely the harassment gay men and lesbians are forced to endure on the streets of their city.

The patrol organized last May to compensate for inadequate police protection and to embarrass police into taking action against queer-bashing incidents. These attacks are no longer seen as isolated events, but as examples of a pastime that, if not actually condoned by police, is certainly not discouraged. "Until we feel that the police are doing an adequate job of protecting us, we will continue to patrol," says TGP's Paul Aboud.

Liz Devine, also of TGP, adds, "We are not the 'gay police.' There is a misconception in the community that the patrol will work gay dances or marshal demos to keep gay people in line. This is not our function."

The patrol sees itself as a reminder to gay people of the need to be wary of the threat of attack. "Awareness of danger is the key to prevention," says patrol member Rob Fulton.

TGP is presently recruiting new members who must undergo 24 hours of training in self-defence and medical and legal matters. The emphasis in the training is non-violent. As Fulton says, "We are here to prevent violent situations, not to encourage them. 'Straight-bashing' is not tolerated."

A desire to do something about queer-bashing is cited by patrol members as their primary reason for joining TGP. Another reason is the chance to meet like-minded lesbians and gay men who share a desire for community action. As Jack Fowler of TGP explains, "There are lots of fringe benefits involved, but the emphasis remains on community responsibility."

Lesbians are encouraged to join the patrol. Chris Higgins explains, "Queer-bashing is not just the concern of gay men; lesbians, too, are targets of these attacks." She adds, "I joined the patrol to expose myself to gay men and learn more about them." This year the patrol will expand its territory to include a bar frequented by lesbians.

Anyone wishing to join TGP or to start a patrol in another city is invited to call 928-3325, 488-2578, or 961-8046. Classes will begin in May.

Mayors afraid of scaring the horses

VICTORIA — The methods that prostitutes and their customers use to "get together" have come under fire recently from various British Columbia politicians who want to see changes in Canadian laws dealing with soliciting.

Municipal officials in Vancouver and Victoria are urging the federal government to amend the Criminal Code to make it easier for police to charge people with soliciting, which now has to be "pressing or persistent" to be an offence. Prostitution itself is legal in Canada, but people can be charged under various soliciting, loitering, or "bawdy house" laws (See analysis in TBP, October 1981).

Vancouver recently adopted its own bylaw, with fines ranging from $350 to $2,000 for anyone trying to buy or sell sex on the city's streets. After the bylaw was passed April 6, Mayor Mike Harcourt explained that residents of the West End neighbourhood had been preparing to confront and photograph prostitutes if the city had not taken such action. According to Harcourt's executive assistant, Jane MacDonald, the bylaw is only an interim measure, and Vancouver's municipal officials will continue to seek changes to the country's Criminal Code. MacDonald emphasized that the mayor is "not against prostitution. There are 101 ways of people getting together to do this," she said. "Prostitutes shouldn't be taking over entire neighbourhoods. What the mayor is saying is, 'Be discreet; don't use the street.'"

In the first week of enforcing the bylaw, Vancouver police presented eleven people — three prostitutes and eight customers — with summonses.

Victoria's mayor, Peter Pollen, says that no similar bylaw is planned for his city because of the expected two-year challenge of the Vancouver law's validity in the courts. "The whole thing has been blown up," he told TBP. "The cause of it was the growing frustration and group paranoia among police officers. The public looks upon the police officer with great expectations, and when he doesn't have a law to use, he gets frustrated."

Pollen said that he, like Harcourt, was not against prostitution itself, but was opposed to its public manifestations. "I guess it shows hypocrisy to a degree," he admitted. "Lady Astor said, 'I don't care what you do as long as you don't scare the horses.' And that's about how I feel with prostitution."

MEDICINE

Will we get the vaccine we helped make?

Representing one of the most significant medical advances of the past decade, a vaccine to combat hepatitis B is soon to be released for general distribution.

Tests over the past five years on several thousand American gay men have already shown that the vaccine is extremely effective in providing long-term protection against infection with the hepatitis B virus.

Merck, Sharpe and Dohme (MSD), the Pennsylvania-based pharmaceutical firm which developed the vaccine, recently announced that the product will be available for purchase July 1 in the US, and in Canada as soon as the federal Department of Health and Welfare issues a licence. The MSD distributor in Canada estimates that they will begin distribution here by September or October. But fears are mounting in the gay community that the high cost and the limited quantities likely to be released initially in Canada may mean that most gay men will not get the vaccine.

Hepatitis B is one of the most serious and common sexually-transmitted diseases among gay men. In any twelve-month period, as many as one out of every four sexually active gay men will contract the disease. Those affected may exhibit mild to severe symptoms, such as inflammation of the liver, jaundice, fever, weakness, loss of appetite, malaise, headache and muscle pain. About 6 to 10% of patients will become chronic carriers, with virus or viral protein continuing to circulate in their blood. Up to one in a hundred cases will result in death, either from acute liver failure or from the eventual appearance of liver cancer.

In addition to gay men, other persons at high risk of contracting the disease are those routinely exposed to blood (surgeons, dentists, nurses, medical lab technicians, kidney dialysis patients) as well as individuals in mental and penal institutions. With 100,000 new cases of hepatitis B occurring each year in North America, demand for the vaccine promises to be fierce.

MSD representatives have said that, at least initially, quantities of the vaccine will be limited. It is the first vaccine to be made from human blood, and the 65 weeks necessary for production and testing is longer than the manufacturing time of any other vaccine.

The process begins with the collection of blood plasma from individuals known to be chronic carriers of the virus. Because of their high infection and carrier rate, gay men have supplied much of the starting material for the vaccine's production.

During the manufacturing process the blood plasma is treated to inactivate any residual virus, subsequent to the purification of viral proteins. Studies on gay men, first in New York City and then in five other major US centres, have

Mandatory VD testing dropped

TORONTO — The local Board of Health has officially "canned" the court programme that led to 20 men, charged as "keepers" in last year's bath raids, being ordered to undergo VD testing.

The VD Review Committee, in a recent report to the board, recommended that the programme be terminated on the grounds that its social benefits did not justify the threat to individual liberties.

The issue of mandatory VD testing was called into question after Dr William Frank of the Department of Public Health VD Control Section was quoted in the media on February 12, 1981, stating that the men charged as "keepers" would be required to undergo testing. This action prompted a letter from two Toronto physicians, Randall Coates and Stephen Atkinson, to the Board of Health criticizing the programme and questioning the motive in maintaining it. "We are hard pressed to view these issuances as measures of VD prevention. Rather, they appear to us as additional indications of harassment of the gay minority under the guise of an archaic legal mandate," wrote Coates and Atkinson.

The rationale for the court programme, which routinely ordered those charged with certain sexual offences to undergo VD testing, was that these individuals ran a greater risk of being infected. Although the VD Review Committee found this to be true of prostitutes, they found no sound epidemiological evidence to justify mandatory screening of "keepers of steam baths."

shown that three injections of the purified viral protein given over a period of six months result in complete protective immunity in almost all cases.

The vaccine does not provide any protection against hepatitis A, which is caused by a completely different virus and which is responsible for about half the hepatitis cases in gay men. Hepatitis A, however, is not considered as serious an illness because it does not give rise to the carrier state nor to liver cancer. The vaccine also will not provide protection against much rarer viruses which can also cause hepatitis.

Hubert Martel, vice-president of MSD Canada, told TBP that the company hopes there will be no shortage of vaccine in Canada. "Hundreds of thousands of doses will be available," he said, "and while there is a limited supply, we expect to be able to meet demand." Martel also remarked that the vaccine will be very expensive, perhaps $150 for the three injections. Provincial health insurance programmes will not cover this expense in most circumstances, leaving a heavy financial burden upon individuals.

However, TBP has learned from reliable sources in the US that the quantity of vaccine to be released here is almost certain to be far less than "hundreds of thousands" of doses. Because of production shortfalls, Canada will likely receive enough vaccine to immunize only 30,000 people. This will clearly be far less than the demand, given that in Ontario alone there are 20,000 high-risk health professionals and 10,000 institutionalized persons in addition to a large gay male population.

With the threat of a shortage looming, some provincial governments are considering purchasing quantities of the vaccine for distribution. Saskatchewan apparently has already placed an order with MSD Canada's head office in Montreal. Dr R Andreychuk of the Ontario Ministry of Health told TBP that they are presently holding discussions to decide the extent to which the province will become involved in the distribution of the vaccine. If substantial quantities are purchased by provincial governments, the priority for distribution would lie with the provinces instead of MSD.

In either case, gay men may find themselves ranked with low priority compared to dentists, doctors and institutionalized persons. It would be ironic indeed if a vaccine made from gay blood, and safety tested on gay volunteers, were not readily available to our community.

Bill Lewis

The report also emphasized that confidentiality was being breached by the court programme, since it was public knowledge that people charged with certain sexual offences would be required to undergo VD testing. The VD Prevention Act guarantees that all information relating to individuals tested would remain strictly confidential.

In a similar incident in Montreal in October 1977, 144 men charged as founders after a police raid on the Truxx bar were forced to undergo medical examinations for VD, and then ordered to submit to further tests as one of the bail requirements pending trial. After a long battle, the Quebec Court of Appeal decided in August 1979 that the municipal court had exceeded its jurisdiction in ordering these subsequent tests. The legality of the first test, however, since the Public Health Act regulation allows them, was upheld.

Lesbian action sparks new groups

Montreal, Toronto and five British Columbia cities were the sites of organized lesbian activity against the right March 27. The day of simultaneous events was planned at last May's lesbian conference in Vancouver.

In the province where the idea first caught fire, coordination was provided by the Lesbian Action Committee of the British Columbia Federation of Women. While only small numbers of women attended a workshop on lesbians and the law in Vernon and a video screening in Terrace, in both centres lesbian support groups have been formed as a result. Northern Lesbians, based in Terrace, has established links with gay people in Prince Rupert and Alaska, while Vernon has already arranged a social event involving lesbians from all over the Okanagan Valley, including women from mixed gay organizations in Kelowna and Kamloops.

In Victoria, a series of social and educational activities was organized by an ad hoc group of lesbians from the Lesbian Caucus of Rape Assault and the Vancouver Island lesbian newspaper, Flagrant. It included radio and television interviews, a display at the women's bookstore, a film and video festival and the first mixed (lesbian and gay male) dance the city has seen in six years. The dance was co-sponsored by the Island Gay Community Centre and proceeds went to the lesbian community.

A group of eight Vancouver women took only three weeks to pull off the most ambitious of the March 27 projects. The festivities ranged from a Saturday lunch, to a rally emceed by comedian Lorna Boshman and entertained by singers Maura and Luna, to a march led by marshalls wielding lavender pom poms, which wound its way through throngs of Saturday shoppers in fashionable Gastown. A day of workshops took place on Sunday.

Montreal's Day of Lesbian Solidarity seems to have been the most serious of the affairs. A day of workshops, conducted in French, began at 9 am with 50 participants. Attendance had tripled by the time the discussions concluded. According to one observer, discussing topics like Differences Among Lesbians and Lesbian Visibility kept the day from living up to its name or the hopes of the organizers. "Beginning with the question of what a lesbian is really brought out divisions rather than solidarity," she noted.

The workshops were followed by a plenary, a film showing and a dance. In the plenary, some lesbians raised objections to other women participating in this year's gay pride march. Two decisions were made: to prepare a manifesto and to meet again in October.

The Lesbian Day of Action held in Toronto also departed from the fighting the right theme set out by the Vancouver conference.

The afternoon began with ballroom dancing (essential for the socially correct dyke this season, according to the poster) and a self-defence demonstration. Discussions of politics and sex drew the most enthusiastic response from the more than 100 women in attendance. "Women were attracted by our fun approach," said organizer Weir, "but once they got there they were interested in serious discussions."

The sex workshops were the first such public discussions organized by a lesbian group in Toronto. "It wasn't possible for everyone to open up in such a large group," one participant complained afterwards. "I couldn't have said what I was really thinking, when we were talking about what turns us on, for fear of being judged," said another.

It was an important beginning, Weir insists. "We're moving away from lesbian feminism as defined by the Furies in 1970 when everything was wonderful and we were all supposed to think alike," she said. "That orthodoxy is breaking down; knee-jerk responses aren't good enough any more. I think that's the best that can be hoped for."

The day was financed by a grant from the Gay Community Appeal.

Getting set for Doing It!

TORONTO — "Doing It! Lesbian and Gay Liberation in the 80s," a national conference and festival, will be held here June 26 to July 4.

A dance put on by Toronto's Gay Community Dance Committee will launch the festivities, followed by Lesbian and Gay Pride Day celebrations the next day.

The conference will begin June 30 and will include lots for the brain (discussion on policing, lesbian and gay youth, the right, the politics of sex), lots for the soul and brain (movies, theatre events, art displays) and lots for the soul alone (dances, picnics, opportunities to meet people).

Groups like Gay Fathers and the North American Man/Boy Love Association will be holding mini-conferences. There will be sessions with names like "Wilde 82" (herstory and history), and "Lesbians in the Gay Movement" (sponsored by the Coalition for Gay Rights in Ontario) and a gay media conference sponsored by TBP.

A highlight of the conference will be the world premiere of a film on Toronto's 1981 bath raids, with a cast of four thousand.

For registration or further information, contact "Doing It!" in care of the Toronto Gay Community Council, 730 Bathurst Street, Toronto, ON M5S 2R4, or telephone (416) 533-6824.

Come and "Do It" in Toronto this summer!

Gay council a new umbrella for Toronto

From an underground subculture a decade ago to thousands of angry — or celebratory — lesbians and gay men in the streets (not once, but eight or nine times in the past year), Toronto's gay community has seen some dramatic changes. Growth hasn't always been an easy, or an even, process.

The early Toronto gay movement was dominated by one or two umbrella organizations, much like those that thrive in many Canadian cities today. The typical gay liberation umbrella group has a newsletter, a lesbian caucus, an education committee, a phoneline, a political action committee and a dance committee. And nowadays, in larger cities, much of its activity is probably geared to what the Moral Majority calls recruitment — making it easier for more of us to come out.

In the course of a decade in Toronto, a disjointed collection of 60 or more social, religious, political, cultural, professional, recreational and community service organizations (not to mention many gay-identified businesses and individual professionals) has emerged.

Somewhere along the way, though, they or their forebears gave up trying to fit under one organizational umbrella. By 1978, when a meeting was called to organize a common response to Anita Bryant's visit, many lesbian and gay male activists were surprised at how many others showed up, at how many people they knew, and at how many they didn't.

Since then, especially through George Hislop's attempts to enter municipal politics, Toronto's gay population has acquired a much higher public profile which has contributed to its own confidence and development. The higher profile has proven to be a mixed blessing, bringing with it increased hostility, most notably from the police, which has in turn hastened the community's transformation.

In the wake of the bathhouse raids, an idea that had been kicking around for a while took on new urgency. The Gay Community Council was formed.

Membership has ballooned since the first dozen groups began meeting in the drafty basement of the 519 Community Centre in March 1981. As many as 25 organizations at a time, from among a total of about 35 participants, send representatives to meetings held the fourth Wednesday of every month.

A temporary structure for the council was adopted in January of this year and it is still, carefully, unfolding. A committee of five coordinators keeps things going between meetings. Standing committees have been formed to investigate gay community/police relations (the sin-

SPORTS

In pursuit of the coveted ruby slippers

TORONTO — The Judy Garland Memorial Bowling League played the last evening of its regular season April 19 and, for the second year running, the team with the unlikely name of Rainbow High captured the coveted Ruby Slippers trophy.

The JGMBL is one of the oldest gay sports leagues in North America, dating its origins in the mid 1960s.

In the 1966-67 season, the St James Bowling League consisted of eight teams, one of which boasted four lesbians and one gay male known to the league as "Gypsy." When one of the team members took ill, Jim Smith (not his real name), a friend of Gypsy, was asked to substitute. The next year there were two gay teams, and by the following year half the league was gay. Jim Smith became secretary, the only official position the league had then. In 1969 the league declared itself all-gay and changed its name to the Judy Garland Memorial Bowling League.

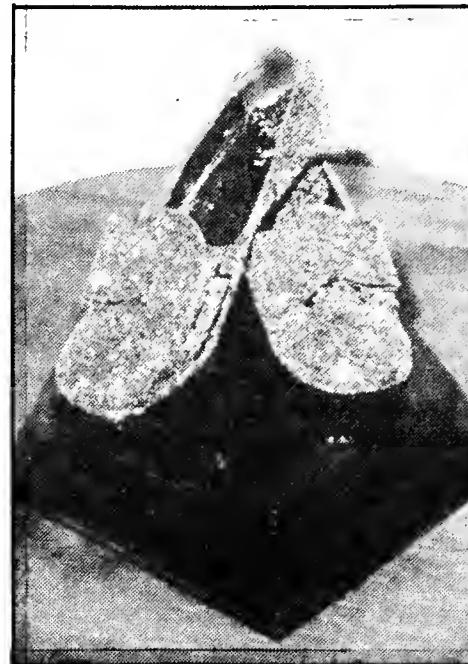

Smith recalls the early days of mixed-orientation play with amusement. To the dismay of straight bowlers the members of one of the early gay teams, who called themselves the Butter Tarts, were not at all closeted about their sexuality. They developed disconcerting habits such as shrilling in unison "oh no!" whenever a team member bowled a gutterball. One night the straights got so upset they challenged the gays to "step outside." Unimpressed, the Butter Tarts, hands on hips, retorted "Are you kidding?"

With the formation of the JGMBL, such problems were eliminated. The new name was taken from a spot on Fire Island between the Pines and Cherry Grove then called the Judy Garland Memorial Park (now spoken of as the Meat Rack). The Judy Garland theme has inspired team names such as Emerald City, Friends of Dorothy, and Toto Too.

In 1980 the International Gay Bowling Organization (IGBO) was formed, the JGMBL being one of the founding members. All the other leagues were American. The proliferation of gay bowling leagues in most large American cities since then has been remarkable. There are eight in Milwaukee alone.

Smith, still the league secretary, attributes bowling's success to the fact that it is an equalizing sport. Under the handicap system, each player competes against his own average score, so that anyone can be a "star for a night" by bowling much better than her average. Smith contrasts this to softball (of which he is a avid player) where the less skilled team members never really get a chance to save a game. "Bowling is something you can do outside the bars on a week night that includes competition but not too much pressure," Smith said. "It's very social. In the course of the season you get to meet almost everyone in the league."

The American leagues are continually amazed by JGMBL's outrageousness at international tournaments. At the Texas Roll-Off Tournament (TROT II) in Houston which took place at the time of last July's royal wedding, the Rainbow High team sported tiaras and handed out royal couple matchboxes "from the family" "All those big hunks said things like, 'Can I have two? My mother collects them,'" Smith chortled.

Thirty-five JGMBL players attended the Second Dixie Classic in Atlanta over the Easter weekend. They took "lots of Toronto postcards and those Dominion shopping bags that say, 'You'll love us for more than our meat'." Obviously the Americans do; Houston for one won't play in a tournament unless Toronto is invited.

But the history of the league hasn't been all smooth rolling. In the summer of 1979, the downtown Olympia Edward bowling alley closed, causing the other Toronto gay league (SLY I) to fold and the JGMBL, with a depleted membership, to play the following season at an alley in suburban North York. Since then membership has swelled again and this past year has seen a switch to ten-pin bowling (which the Americans play) from five-pin.

With nicknames for its members like Betty Anne, Gypsy, and Porno (Jim Smith), and a nightly Tessie Time featuring the tacky jokes of "Tessie", who has become almost a league institution. Bowling night for the Judy Garland is as much a party as anything else.

As this season draws to a close with the playoffs, the league looks forward to its infamous annual banquet. True to the tradition started by the Butter Tarts in 1969, when they affronted the formally-dressed straights by arriving in tennis shorts and elbow-length gloves and handing out two dozen butter tarts (the edible kind) to their "favourite players," the banquets have always been the occasion of much outrageousness.

The banquet has been held at the Town and Country and at the Metropolitan Community Church. Both places told them never to come back. For three years the banquet was also held at the now-defunct Carriage House Hotel and at the old King Edward Hotel. Quipped Smith, "we're good at closing places down."

gle biggest item on the council's agenda since the release of the Bruner Report), social services for young lesbians and gay men, a committee to organize "Doing it!" Lesbian and Gay Liberation in the '80s — a conference scheduled for June 30 - July 4, the inescapable finance committee and, working closely with it, a membership committee.

This last, modest-sounding project — a membership committee — is pivotal to the council's future, according to conventional wisdom among existing council representatives. They know they have to be able to sell the organization as a more innovative, vital version of the too-often-disputed "umbrella," both to the members of their own groups and to the many groups that have so far only received council minutes.

With a membership structure that allows each group to choose its own level of participation, fees designed to cover costs while not taxing anyone's resources beyond what they can afford and a commitment to an efficient version of consensus decision-making, they shouldn't have too much difficulty. Gay people not affiliated with other groups may participate directly in the council through its own committees and by supporting its projects — particularly "Doing it!" and the 24-hour recorded telephone calendar (923-GAYS), for which the council has now taken responsibility. The council has two important things going for it: a lot of exciting things are happening in the community, and many of the people who make them happen recognize the value of talking to each other.

City pays GO staff

OTTAWA — Gays of Ottawa has received a $10,000 municipal grant to hire a volunteer coordinator, whose job will include improving liaison between the gay community and social service agencies, as well as generating greater gay community involvement in the activities of Gays of Ottawa.

The grant was awarded on April 7, after being initially rejected in the city's committee system. According to one GO activist, much lobbying was required for City Council to overturn the Social Planning and Development Committee's initial verdict.

On the day of the vote, broadcaster Lowell Green used his three hour hotline radio show to get 155 people to register their opposition to the grant by phoning city hall. Green admitted that he didn't know what the grant was for, just that it was going to Gays of Ottawa.

Apart from that, GO deliberately tried to keep media coverage to a minimum before the grant was approved. "We were more interested in getting the money than the publicity," gay activist John Duggan said. "But the extensive coverage that did occur after the vote was surprisingly non-sensationalistic." □

On the road with the found-in follies

TORONTO — With its cast of thousands and its three locations, Toronto's famous bath-raid trials seem to be all over the map. Here's an update:

Back Door Gym and Sauna

Allan C Fetterly, owner of the Back Door Gym and Sauna, was found guilty of keeping a common bawdy house in a judgement handed down by Judge H Meen, March 26. Fetterly was fined $3,000. A sum of $1,200, confiscated by police on the day of the raid, was ordered returned to Fetterly over Crown objections. Co-accused, Dale DeLong and Gerald Willett, were given conditional discharges and one year's probation.

Fetterly is appealing the conviction, a process which could take up to ten months. However, the Crown is reported to have advised the Back Door's landlord of the conviction. Such a notice obliges the landlord to "take all reasonable steps to prevent a recurrence of the offence," which means the bath could well be closed.

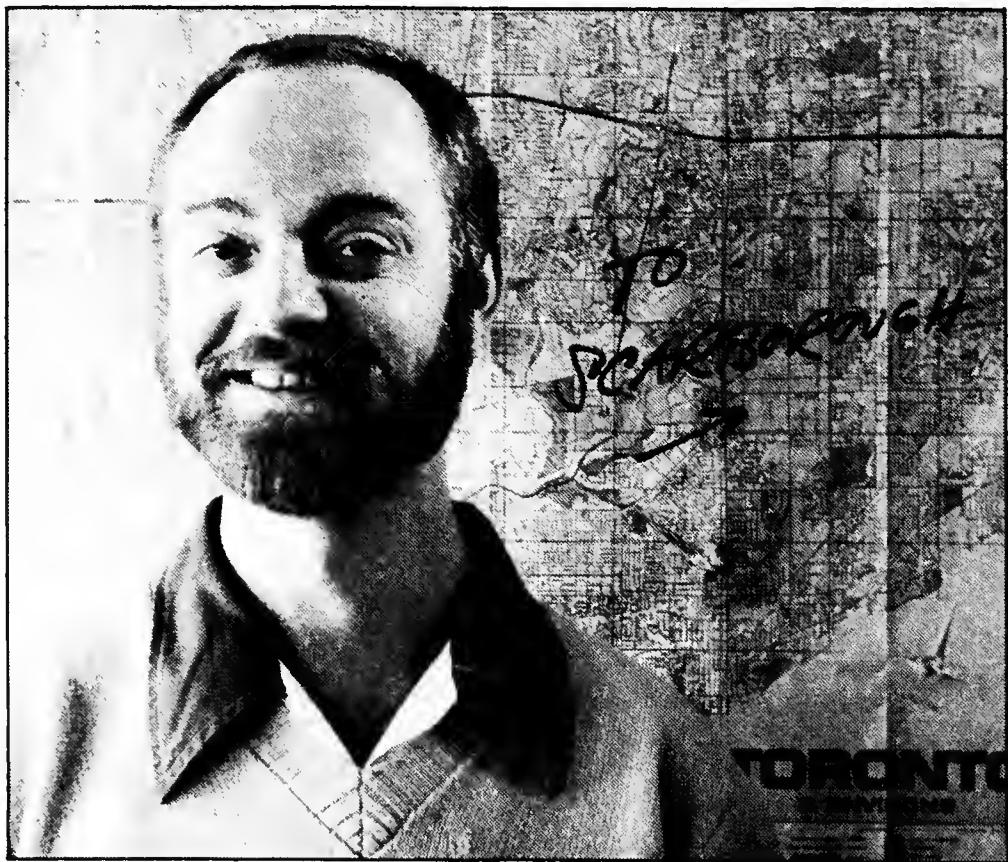

Until the appeal is heard, however, closure is halted. The Back Door Gym and Sauna remains open. "Business is booming," Fetterly told TBP.

Barracks/Club Baths

Did police have "reasonable and probable" grounds for laying conspiracy charges against the owners of the Barracks and the Club? As defence counsel Morris Manning sees it, they did not.

A preliminary hearing began before Judge D F Graham April 1, the details of which we cannot report. However, Manning brought the proceedings to an abrupt halt by giving notice of appeal of a decision made within the hearing, which is now not expected to resume until September at the earliest.

The conspiracy charges were laid by Sgt Carter of Intelligence. His investigation, he told Manning before the hearing, did not discover any links between the bath owners and organized crime.

RTPC legal co-ordinator Dennis Findlay: how one helping hand can get two found-ins off

Scarborough Fare

"Scarborough? Isn't that where the bluffs are?" "Yeah. They used to be along the shore. Now they've moved them indoors." (Overheard in the court corridor.)

Site of the indoor bluffs is Scarborough's Courtroom 405. April 16 saw the conclusion of the first eight of 19 trial days set aside in Scarborough to try bath-raid found-ins. Over 135 cases were parachuted into Toronto's eastern suburb at a marathon trial-setting session February 19. Of these, two have already been lobbed back into the city.

So far, all found-ins have pleaded not guilty, leaving the onus on the crown to prove otherwise. Trials can be short or long, but the shortest are those in which the Crown fails to produce evidence, as when arresting officers are unable to appear in court.

Observers have noted a possible advantage for found-ins brought to trial in Scarborough. They have a long way to travel, but so do Crown witnesses. The latter very often don't make it and charges are then withdrawn.

Fully adjudicated trials have been occurring on average of one trial per trial-day. Identification of the accused has become a crucial issue in these trials. Judges have been allowing counsel to keep their clients concealed in the body of the court until identified and pointed out by a Crown witness, usually the arresting officer.

In order to protect the rights of the found-ins in this regard, Crown witnesses have been sent out of the court to prevent them from seeing the accused during the reading of the charges. However, one observer found that by standing in the court hallway it was easy to see a defendant through windows in the courtroom door when he left the body of the court to stand before the judge while the charge was read.

Fears were expressed that the windows thus provided excluded Crown witnesses with an unnoticed opportunity to refresh their memories. The Crown vehemently declared such fears were groundless, but the same observer later noticed Crown witnesses had suddenly become quite scrupulous about not appearing near the windows.

Protection of the identity of the defendants has in some cases been carried to comic extremes. One court visitor, incorrectly identified by an officer as the man he arrested the night of the raid, stood up to deny that he was the person charged. Dismayed, the Crown demanded, "What is your name?" Undismayed, the visitor refused to state his name: "I have a driver's licence. I'll show that to you," he offered. "What is your name?" the Crown shouted. The visitor remained silent, looking at the defence counsel. Argument broke out between the contending attorneys. The visitor remained nameless. The overlooked defendant came forward and identified himself. The case was dismissed.

Defendants have also been winning acquittal on the ground of "lawful excuse." Judges have been accepting a variety of explanations from accused persons: a cheap room for the night; sauna used for therapeutic reasons (arthritis, asthma); poor late-night transit service to home in the suburbs; a visit to check gym facilities; newly-painted apartment unpleasant....

Found-in charges may well be the most boring to prosecute. Until the 1981 raids they had never been extensively fought. By fighting the charges, gay defendants have been igniting a procedure that had previously degenerated into rubber stamping.

Dennis Findlay, court monitor for the Right to Privacy Committee, learned of a defendant who had come to court April 6 wanting to plead not guilty. The only drawback was that the accused had no lawyer. Findlay advised the Crown that he would appear for the found-in. The practice was not unheard of, but it was Findlay's first try. At the end of his presentation, the judge gave the defendant an acquittal. Two days later, Findlay argued a second case. He won that too. A rueful Crown remarked after the first win: "He did a good job. A fellow with no legal training at all!" and then added sceptically, "— he says."

Crown Attorneys have a way with words. Two of them say "heterosexual," giving the word a thermal touch.

An undercover officer testifying at the Barracks/Club conspiracy hearings told of seeing a naked male with his legs drawn up "in what is known as the 'military' position." Sexologists in the court concluded that the officer meant to say the "missionary" position, but assumed the Barracks would have a martial word for it.

Prominent Canadians sign up for privacy

TORONTO — What do Pierre Berton, John Sewell, the Student Christian Movement of Canada, the Cooperative Housing Federation of Toronto, Robert Fulford, Leo Panitch, June Callwood, and the Quaker Committee on Jails and Justice all have in common?

They all want to see Canada's "bawdy house" laws repealed, and they've all signed an advocacy ad which the Right to Privacy Committee will run in the Globe and Mail, stating just that.

The full-page ad is scheduled to run at some point during deliberations by the federal government's Justice and Legal Affairs Committee on Bill C-53. This omnibus bill will, if passed, bring changes to various parts of the Criminal Code, including sections dealing with age of consent and a host of sexual offences. The legislation does not, however, include repeal of the Code's bawdy house provisions. As of TBP's mid-April press date, the bill was scheduled to be before committee from April 21 through the end of May.

There's still time to "sign up for privacy." Send your name, signature and a cheque for $10 (to help pay for the ad) to Privacy Ad Campaign, 730 Bathurst St, Toronto, ON M5S 2R4.

Bawdy house status of bar upheld

MONTREAL — The Quebec Court of Appeal on March 9 upheld a 1980 ruling that the owner of the Truxx bar was guilty of keeping a common bawdy-house. The court also maintained the fine of $5,000 levied against owner Giuseppe Salvaggio while reducing his prison term from 10 to three days.

Truxx was originally raided by police in October 1977 and 140 men were arrested as found-ins. These men have not yet been tried, nor have they had even one court appearance, presumably because the Crown was awaiting the outcome of the keeper's appeal.

The raid caused considerable anger in the gay community towards the police, who descended on the club in full riot gear, forced many of the patrons to submit later to VD tests and locked up 20 men in jail overnight. The subsequent trial only increased gay animosity, as the presiding judge, Roland Langlois (now retired), was blatantly partial to the Crown's case and often questioned the accused in an aggressive manner. His judgment paid no attention to defence testimony and rested entirely on police accounts of activities in the bar.

In the appeal court decision, Judge Montgomery admitted that Langlois's cross-examination of defence witnesses was uncalled for, but maintained he was not in error in giving more credibility to police testimony. The court also found that acts of gross indecency, by which the trial judge specified he meant mutual masturbation and anal intercourse, had taken place, and that even though these acts were performed in the toilets, the stall doors were open, allowing anyone to see what was going on.

Montgomery added that he felt even if the majority of the Truxx clientele did not participate in indecent acts themselves, they went there to watch. Part of his reason for this was the full name of the establishment, "Truxx Cruising Bar," which, he said, was suggestive of "habitually promiscuous" behaviour.

It is not yet known whether the owner intends to appeal the matter further.

Teacher faces indecency charges

MONTREAL — A Montreal teacher was charged on two counts each of gross indecency and contributing to juvenile delinquency April 8, when it was discovered he had been having sex with two male students, aged 15 and 16.

Roch Menard, 43, a music teacher at l'école polyvalente La Magdeleine in the Montreal suburb of Laprairie, was charged following complaints by the students' mothers. Menard resigned immediately after the charges were made public.

The story received sensational coverage in the Journal de Montréal and particularly in the scandal sheet Photo Police which ran a two-page spread complete with photos. Both papers alleged that prostitution was involved, and hinted that Menard has had relations with at least 10 students over the past few years.

Menard emphatically denied the prostitution allegations, stating the students were willing participants, and that he had given them money for taxi fare and other expenses, but not for sex. In fact, Menard told Photo Police he had been living with the mother of one of the adolescents, and that she had been fully aware of his relationship with her son.

Even school board president Rolland Charlebois was quoted in the Journal as saying he felt that while Menard was primarily responsible, the students had had sex with him of their own accord. "At 15 years of age," he said, "one is no longer a child."

The trial date is set for May 4.

DISCRIMINATION

"A delicate matter": School bars speaker

MONTREAL — A high school principal refused to allow a speaker from Gay and Lesbian Friends of Concordia (University) to address a grade 11 humanities class recently because the topic was "a delicate matter and parents might object."

The speaker was to be part of a presentation by a group of Wagar High School students to their classmates on the subject of homosexuality. One of the students in the group, Peggy Donenfeld, said the project had already been approved by parents. However, principal Herre de Groot refused to take this into account and vetoed the speaker.

Gay and Lesbian Friends of Concordia member Jon Wolfe has sent a letter of complaint to Quebec's human rights commission, since the province's rights code prohibits discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. Due to the backlog of cases, the complaint will probably not be heard for several months, according to Giselle Cloutier of the commission.

The class presentation went ahead, with the students using an audiotape of an interview with members of the Concordia group rather than the live speaker. According to Peggy Donenfeld, "The class was very interested and I think the students learned a lot from it."

The incident received some coverage in local news media, including two artic-

Fired social worker seeks compensation

VANCOUVER — A gay social service worker continues the battle to have his name cleared of allegations that he had sex with a fifteen-year-old hustler. Rob Joyce was fired February 3 from his position as a job counsellor at Senator House, a multi-faceted programme for street kids in the Granville-Davie Street area (see TBP, March). His employer, the British Columbia Corrections Association (BCCA), dismissed Joyce for reasons ranging from using working hours "to attend to matters of a personal nature" to being "uncooperative, unpleasant, demanding and hostile." The reasons were supplied after Joyce repeatedly demanded written clearance of the unsubstantiated charges that he had paid a youth $60 for a blow-job.

"I was in a Catch-22 situation," said Joyce. "If I had said nothing the allegation would stand; since I complained, I'm punished for complaining."

In a carefully worded letter March 8, William Kelley, chairman of the Management Committee of the BCCA, told Joyce that he was "satisfied" that there was no reason for his employer to dismiss, suspend or discipline Joyce as there was no "evidence" to support the allegations. Included with this statement was a letter of reference praising Joyce for his tenacity and his ability to work independently.

Joyce called Kelley's statements "valueless" and vowed he will continue to prepare a case for wrongful dismissal against his employer. "In fact, the letter really has done nothing but aggravate the situation," Joyce told TBP.

Still pending is a report from the provincial ombudsman's office which was initiated in February and is expected to be released shortly. "I think the (ombudsman's) report will clear me beyond a shadow of a doubt," Joyce remarked.

Joyce is determined to receive compensation for both his dismissal and the "three months of agony" which have resulted from his pleas for just treatment. He feels his credibility as a social service worker is jeopardized until all parties concerned denounce the allegations in writing.

Joyce continues to plan legal action against the provincial Ministry of Human Resources and the Alternate Shelter Society, the body which oversees the Senator House Project.

Forces fight rights

OTTAWA — The Canadian Armed Forces has asked the federal government for exemption from certain sections of the new Charter of Rights and Freedoms barring discrimination on the basis of opinion or belief, criminal record, sex and mental or physical handicap. However, government officials indicate that the request will almost certainly be denied, and that the Armed Forces Act might even be tightened up to ensure that the military complies fully with the new Charter.

A National Defence Department spokesperson told the Globe and Mail March 10 that the exemptions were needed "to ensure the discipline and order that is necessary in the Armed Forces."

Although sexual orientation is included in neither the Charter nor the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Armed Forces have made clear their opposition to extending protection to homosexuals. National Defence deputy judge advocate Col Frank Karwandy told the national defence subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs that homosexuals are open to blackmail even when their sexuality is known, and that "History has shown that homosexual conduct undermines morale and creates conflicts in interpersonal relationships which would have a detrimental effect on the operational efficiency of the Forces." He added that he felt the Canadian public was not prepared to accept homosexuals in the military.

Karwandy also listed a number of other factors which he said could undermine the standards of the Forces, such as certain political beliefs, criminal records, mental handicaps and women in combat roles.

It is uncertain if or when the matter will be dealt with by parliament.

RELIGION

A gay United Church moderator?

TORONTO — A prominent local clergyman has publicly prayed that his church will elect a homosexual to its highest office.

Rev Clifford Elliott, minister of downtown Bloor Street United Church, made the remark April 17 in his column in the Toronto Star. It came at the end of a point-by-point refutation of five arguments used recently by the Hamilton Conference of the United Church of Canada to justify its refusal to ordain openly lesbian and gay ministers.

Elliott wrote that the Hamilton body's decision "fills me with great sadness. More than that. Shame.... We are presently celebrating the election of our first woman moderator. I pray it will not be long before we elect our first homosexual."

To the argument that it would be difficult to place gay ministers, Elliott replied that his church "has ordained women for over 40 years — long before congregations were open to receiving them."

He countered the fear that lesbian or gay ministers would molest children with a flat denial, stating that "homosexuals are no more likely to be child molesters than are heterosexuals."

While the Hamilton group thought that lack of protection for homosexuals in human rights codes argued for excluding them from the ministry, Elliott wrote, "Surely the church should campaign for such protection, not bow to the injustice."

Elliott showed the folly of the fourth argument, that it would not be reasonable to ask homosexual ministers to be celibate, by stating the simple fact that celibacy is not required of any United Church clergy.

The final reason given by the Hamilton conference was that there is no theological support for a "gay theology." According to Elliott, that is "merely to say that some theologians disagree with others on the matter of homosexuality."

The decision of one conference does not, however, represent the views of the church as a whole. The personnel committee of the Toronto conference, for example, has recently recommended that a person's sexual orientation not be considered when judging candidates for ordination. And the church's next General Council will consider adopting wide-ranging policy changes on sexual morality, including a recommendation that openly gay and lesbian candidates be accepted for ordination.

ANALYSIS: "DANGEROUS OFFENDERS"

DO: Indefinite term for non-violent "crimes"

George Milne is a prisoner in the federal penitentiary in Mission, British Columbia. He is serving an indeterminate sentence for committing acts of indecency with males under the age of 19.

According to the Criminal Code of Canada, gross indecency (section 157) carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison. George Milne may be in jail for much longer than that. He has been classified as a "Dangerous Offender" (DO).

Milne was originally arrested in February 1979 on five counts each of gross indecency and indecent assault. He pleaded guilty to the former charges later that year and was awaiting sentence when the Crown announced it was going to apply for DO classification.

Milne had two convictions for indecent assault on his record, both more than 10 years previously. However, Milne's current lawyer, Richard Brail, suspects that the DO application would not have been made had Milne been heterosexual.

During Milne's 1980 hearing before Judge G Stephen Denroche, psychiatrists testifying for both the Crown and the defence said they felt Milne could not control his sexual desires. Denroche accordingly declared Milne a DO and sentenced him to the indeterminate jail term.

In September 1981, as part of an appeal of Milne's DO status, two progressive psychiatrists agreed that Milne's sexual preference could not be changed without treatment, but they maintained that he was not a harmful person. They recommended continued treatment rather than incarceration.

On March 10 of this year, however, the British Columbia Court of Appeal unanimously upheld Judge Denroche's decision. If Milne had won this appeal, he would still have faced sentencing on the original gross indecency charges. Now, he will be jailed indefinitely.

Milne's plight is a graphic demonstration of the inhumane treatment so-called sex offenders receive under Canada's Criminal Code. As a DO he will probably be required to submit to psychiatric rehabilitation in order to demonstrate that he is willing to change his sexual patterns. He will also be in constant danger of physical abuse at the hands of other prisoners. In a letter to TBP last fall, Milne wrote: "Things have gotten so bad I voluntarily signed myself into 'the hole,' a segregated unit in the prison, for my own safety."

But, like many other men classified as DOs (most of whom are gay pedophiles), Milne's history shows that he could hardly be considered dangerous. When he was tried for gross indecency in 1979, the Crown dropped the five additional counts of indecent assault because there was no evidence of force, violence or coercion. During the trial, the youths testified that they had been willing participants. Even the sentencing judge described Milne as a gentle, non-coercive individual.

Section 689 of the Criminal Code defines a DO as someone who "has shown a failure to control his sexual impulses, and a likelihood of causing injury, pain or other evil to other persons, through failure in the future to control his sexual impulses." Under Section 689, all that is necessary as evidence is a sex-related conviction and testimony from at least two psychiatrists.

In 1976 the National Gay Rights Coalition (NGRC) presented a brief to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs calling for the abolition of DO legislation. The brief cited a number of flaws in the Criminal Code which reveal an inherent bias against the DO and deny him the rights guaranteed to persons charged under other sections of the Code.

The strongest criticism made by the NGRC brief arises from the lack of clear definition of what a DO is. The Code gives courts little direction in determining dangerousness. Like other ill-defined Criminal Code concepts (such as indecency), dangerousness must be subjectively determined by the presiding judge.

A former professor of social work at McMaster University, Cyril Greenland, studied the cases of 17 DOs in Ontario penitentiaries in 1971. He concluded that "only three of the 17 had been dangerous in the sense of seriously threatening the life or safety of others. The other men were apparently guilty of grossly offensive or indecent behaviour but were not physically violent. In view of this, the practice of sentencing pedophiles and exhibitionists to years of incarceration can hardly be justified."

The DO is somewhat unique among sexual offenders in that his sentence is determined as much on the basis of psychiatric evidence as on the so-called criminal activities he may have committed. But there is no reason to think psychiatrists are in any better position to assess dangerousness than the courts are. In a 1976 report in the Globe and Mail, University of Toronto criminologist Richard V Erickson noted that "psychiatrists cannot make reliable or valid judgments about dangerousness, are more likely to be wrong than right in predicting future violent offences and tend to err on the side of caution, causing persons to be incarcerated for longer periods than they should be."

On February 9 of this year, Russell Fleming, a director of the Penetanguishene Mental Health Centre, was quoted in the Globe and Mail as saying that "the courts should stop foisting the question on psychiatrists" and should make the decision based on the offender's previous record. "The courts shouldn't ask us to get involved in this adversarial nonsense where a Crown attorney shops around for a right-wing psychiatrist to say the man should go (to an institution), while the defence shops around for a left-wing psychiatrist to say he shouldn't," Fleming said.

The law further reveals its anti-sexual bias in allowing the DO classification to be conferred after only one offence. While the Criminal Code states that a pattern of repetitive behaviour must be established before habitual criminal status can be conferred, no such requirement exists in the DO provisions. Further injustices arise from the Code's failure to provide for adequate opportunities for defence against a Crown application for DO status. Although indefinite confinement is one of the most serious sentences anyone can face, there is no provision for a jury trial or for a hearing at a superior court level.

The Code also guarantees only seven days' notice that a person will be subject to consideration as a DO. Since the person is already in jail, he has virtually no opportunity to consult a lawyer and prepare an adequate defence. Once incarcerated, the DO is allowed a yearly review by a parole board only, not by a judge. Even when he is finally released, he is still on parole indefinitely.

Protection from the law is one matter. In prison, the DO, like others convicted on sex-related charges, is in continual danger of reprisals from fellow inmates. In his study, Cyril Greenland summed up the prison experience for the sexual offender: "While incarceration for an indeterminate period may provide some degree of protection for society, it cannot in any sense be regarded as anything but a brutal, fearful and destructive experience for the inmate."

The attitudes of the courts and the psychiatric profession toward DOs cannot be considered in isolation from current public opinion. In recent years, publicity about violent sex crimes by adults against children has hardened attitudes towards intergenerational sex itself. The most recent example of this occurred last fall when a British Columbia man, Clifford Olson, was convicted of the murder of several BC teenagers of both sexes. Brail feels that Milne's appeal may have suffered from the aftermath of the Olson trial, despite the vaunted objectivity of the courts.

Richard Brail suspects that homophobia was a major factor in the BC appeal court's decision to uphold Milne's DO status. The court seemed unmoved by defence arguments that Milne had neither harmed the youths nor coerced them into having sex. "All they seemed interested in was the fact that he had been having sex with teenage boys, and had a continuing interest in doing so. In their minds, this was clearly sufficient evidence of 'evil to other persons' to maintain George's status," Brail told TBP.

The DO question also raises the larger issue of what have been called victimless crimes. DO status can be seen as part of a much larger category of offences, including buggery, indecent assault and gross indecency, where no actual harm has been done by the act itself. Most convictions in these cases involve consensual sexual acts prosecuted because the acts were performed in so-called public places, or with underage persons or prostitutes. Many convictions under these laws result from police entrapment. And the three offences mentioned are used primarily against gay men, just as the DO classification is used for the most part against homosexual pedophiles.

The Criminal Code must be amended to protect George Milne, and men like him, from a system bent on legislating personal morality. As the NGRC brief put it, "(these) laws are based on moral judgments of sexual acts, rather than on a desire to protect society from injury. Offences involving coercion or violence of a sexual nature should be dealt with by the same laws which deal with any kind of coercion or violence."

Meanwhile, George Milne is still in jail. Despite the defeat, Brail feels Milne is holding up well. He is now planning to apply for a move to a different institution, where he could have the kind of psychiatric treatment which would, he hopes, allow an earlier parole.

Irish Customs seize Gay News

DUBLIN — As a police witch-hunt continues to spread in the Irish gay community, Britain's largest circulation newspaper for homosexuals, Gay News, has been impounded by Irish Customs officers.

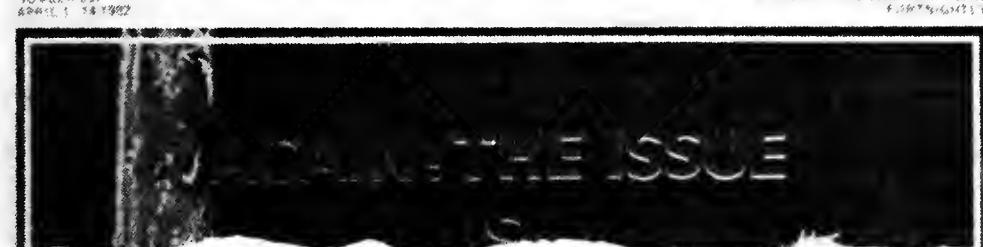

Customs and Excise authorities in Cork impounded subscription copies of Gay News in mid-February, and any issue of the paper entering Ireland is now subject to detention. According to Noel Faughnan, a commissioner at the National Customs Office in Dublin Castle, three recent issues of the paper are being examined by the Censorship of Publications Board. If the board rules the paper is indecent, Gay News might be banned from the Irish Republic completely.

This is the second time that Irish officials have moved against the popular British newspaper. Gay News was impounded in 1977, but the publishers won a case challenging the action.

A massive police offensive against the gay community was touched off by the murder of prominent Dublin television designer Charles Self in February. Gay organizations cooperated in the investigation until it became clear that the police were using the murder as a pretext for an investigation of the gay community itself.

To date more than 1,500 lesbians and gay men have been questioned by police in the course of the investigation, and several hundred have been fingerprinted and photographed. Police are being stationed outside well-known gay clubs and are demanding people's names and addresses as they leave. Speakers at a March 24 meeting described police calling at their homes and workplaces and informing parents and employers of their sexual preference. At least one man is losing his job as a result of the harassment.

Gay sex is still completely illegal in Ireland, and there are fears that police are building a master file of the country's gay community.

A meeting in Dublin's Trinity College set up a Gay Defence Committee March 24. The Committee includes members of the National Gay Federation, the Prisoners' Rights Organization and the Irish Council for Civil Liberties.

The Defence Committee is setting up a special phone line for people to call for legal advice in the face of police interrogation, and a leaflet detailing what to do in case of arrest is being circulated. Plans are underway to involve other Irish gay organizations in the Defence Committee, and arguments will be raised in the Irish parliament demanding an end to the wave of harassment. □

Indecency trial flops, Whitehouse must pay

LONDON — The Romans in Britain trial, touted as the morality battle of the '80s, fizzled out after two days when the prosecution withdrew its case March 16.

The trial was instigated by anti-gay crusader Mary Whitehouse, who rose to fame after she successfully brought a charge of blasphemy against England's Gay News in 1976.

Now president of the National Viewers and Listeners Association, Whitehouse charged that a scene in the National Theatre's production of the Howard Brenton play contravened the 1956 Sexual Offences Act because of a simulated homosexual rape. The play's director, Michael Bogdanov, was charged with "procuring and being party to an act of gross indecency."

The Sexual Offences Act is specifically designed to criminalize male homosexual activity in washrooms. Such are the peculiarities of the law that, had the director of the play been a woman or had the simulated rape been of a woman, there would have been no legal grounds for prosecution. Whitehouse said she felt "the unsuccessful male homosexual rape would be an incitement to some men."

Defence costs were awarded out of public funds, but Whitehouse will have to pay her own legal bill, between

"Boys are very often coerced and threatened as Joey was into making statements about sexual contact with gay men," said Reeves. "In this case there had been no sex between us and Joey, and his statements were lies."

"Judge Outlaw's ruling should indicate that any boy who is thus coerced, even when the statements are true, may invoke the Fifth Amendment and thus remain silent in court," Reeves added. "Joey's attorney gave him correct advice, which would keep about 90% of all similar cases from coming to trial." □

Gay cancer found in straight men, women

NEW YORK — Kaposi's sarcoma, the so-called gay cancer, has been discovered in women and heterosexual men.

US researchers have diagnosed the disease in nine women and at least 23 straight males, according to The Wall Street Journal. It was originally speculated that the disease was somehow related to the gay lifestyle because many of its victims were young, previously healthy gay men. However, the new cases do not appear to be correlated with either promiscuity or drug use.

Nearly 100 deaths have resulted from the disease in the past seven months. It emerges either as cancer or pneumonia after the body's immunity system has broken down. Doctors are now considering the possibility that environmental factors may be responsible for the unusual immuno-suppression characteristic which enables the disease to take hold. □

Gay groups oppose Aussie law reform bill

SYDNEY — For the fourth time in ten months, the New South Wales government is debating a bill to reform the state's laws against homosexual activity.

Legislative Council member Barrie Unsworth, a right-wing member of the Labour Party, introduced the bill to the upper house of the state parliament February 18 without consulting gay movement leaders. Unsworth claims his bill is a "compromise" in light of the defeat of another reform attempt, the so-called Petersen Bill, last December. Unsworth's bill passed second reading in the Council March 16.

Critics of the bill, who include 28 gay organizations in Sydney and progressive members of parliament, charge that it is "dangerous and discriminatory." In the proposed legislation buggery and gross indecency between males will continue to be criminal unless the acts occur between two consenting adults over 18 years of age, in private. The age of consent for heterosexual sex is 16.

Heterosexual sex in public (there is no "two person" clause) is punishable by a $200 fine only if someone complains. However, gay sex in private between more than two persons is classified as "gross indecency," and can incur a two-year prison term even if there is no complainant.

Five hundred lesbian and gay demonstrators marched on parliament early this March to protest the bill and to demand full equality. Gay rights lobbyists are now concentrating on killing the bill in the lower house, having given up all hope of being able to significantly amend it.

denied real equality and justice for homosexual men," said Barry Charles, co-convenor of the Gay Rights Lobby and member of the Homosexual Law Reform Commission. "Our chance for genuine reform is being short-circuited by a conservative parliament and its cynical politics," he added.

In the interim, right-wing National Country Party members are rallying behind Reverend Fred Nile to oppose any pro-gay reform. Nile was elected to parliament on a morality platform at the last state elections. He claims the bill "will further promote the moral and spiritual decadence of Western society."

The conservative clergyman suffered a setback in his anti-gay campaign, however, when the Board of Social Responsibility of his own Uniting Church called for the decriminalization of homosexual acts between consenting adults. Nile is also trying to organize a Moral Majority-style boycott of television advertisers who buy "unwholesome" programmes, but has achieved little success. □

NOLAG threatened as coordinators quit

SAN FRANCISCO — The March 14 resignation of 12 members of the coordinating committee of the National Organization of Lesbians and Gays (NOLAG) seems to spell the death of the organization only a year after it began.

NOLAG was founded in April 1981 by the organizers of the National March on Washington, which occurred in October 1979. The new organization assumed a $19,000 debt incurred by the march. Amidst accusations of financial mismanagement, the debt has been an albatross around the group's neck.

Originally conceived as a national mass-action, grassroots organization with a coordinating committee of 52 people representing 11 regions, there are reportedly only five or six coordinating committee members left, and the national headquarters has been moved to Anchorage, Alaska.

Resigning NOLAG members announced plans to form a new National Activists' Union of Gays and Lesbians, and plan to organize a founding conference this summer. □

Gay "Olympic" Games fight to keep name

SAN FRANCISCO — Despite a continuing dispute with the United States Olympic Committee (USOC) which may end up in court, the Gay Olympic Games are going ahead in San Francisco, August 28 to September 5.

The USOC objects to the word "Olympic" in the advertising and is threatening organizers with legal action unless the Gay Olympic Games drops the word from the name. The organizers declare they are willing to negotiate with the USOC and suggest inserting a disclaimer whenever the word is used, but steadfastly refuse to change the name.

On another front the committee is cancelling a fund-raising showing of Leni Riefenstahl's film Olympia. Riefenstahl, a Nazi sympathizer, made the film of the 1936 Olympics in Berlin as a propaganda piece for Hitler. The showing was cancelled after gay Jews and other activists objected.

Organizers hope the Olympics will provide a "unique opportunity for gay sports people to influence social attitudes" and to combat "popular stereotypes about gays on a global scale through mass media coverage of the events." Opening ceremonies will be held in San Francisco's Kezar Stadium.

To date, 16 countries are indicating they will send contingents. A cross-country run will bring the Olympic torch from the east coast early this summer, and the Olympiad will also sponsor a week-long festival of lesbian and gay artists to coincide with the sports. □

Council of Europe slaps Catholic church

STRASBOURG — The Council of Europe issued a strongly worded statement criticizing the Roman Catholic Church's attitude toward homosexuality April 14.

The criticism followed the Catholic Diocese of Strasbourg's decision not to allow delegates to a meeting of the International Gay Association to use its Young Christian Worker Hostel over Easter as planned.

IGA delegates were attending an informal Easter conference before the organization's yearly International Conference which will be held in Washington from July 12 to 17.

The 120 delegates, representing 27 gay organizations from seven countries, were eventually housed in tents on a disused airfield. □

Australians celebrate Mardi Gras, Gay Day

SYDNEY — This year's annual gay Mardi Gras exceeded all expectations and outdid Sydney's official Mardi Gras as 10,000 lesbians and gay men paraded with 25 floats through the city's entertainment area on the night of Saturday, February 27.

The city's first gay "Mardi Gras" was held in 1978 at the end of Gay Pride activities in June, and resulted in hundreds of arrests after a series of violent confrontations with city police.

This year's event took place without trouble in an atmosphere of mutual cooperation between organizers, gay businesses, city council and police. Sydney now takes its place as the third largest "gay city" in the world.

A smaller but significant gay festival took place two weeks later, on March 14 in Melbourne. More than 3,000 gay people assembled in the grandstand of the city's Olympic Park for an afternoon of song, theatre, and revelry.

Gay Day '82 was the second for the Melbourne community. According to Campaign, Australia's largest circulation gay newspaper, the event achieved what it set out to do — to "find some common ground between the commercial and political interests within the community and to celebrate the change of law regarding homosexuality which inspired the first Gay Day last year." □

Austin groups win protection in housing

AUSTIN — The city's gay community scored its second major victory of the year February 18 as city council approved an amendment to its anti-discrimination by-law designed to protect lesbians and gay men against discrimination in housing.

Last autumn a group calling itself

Austin Citizens for Decency (ACD) went on the offensive and organized a petition drive calling for the adoption of an ordinance reading, "It shall not be unlawful to deny housing on the basis of sexual orientation." Although ACD succeeded in getting the question on a January 16 ballot, the anti-gay measure was soundly defeated by a 63% margin as a result of the work of Citizens for a United Austin (CUA), which was organized to oppose the ordinance.

The February 18 decision to protect lesbians and gay men cannot be repealed by a referendum, and another initiative cannot be held on the identical question for at least two years.

Despite the double defeat, ACD's Steven Hotze said the unsuccessful initiative still let gay people know that "Austin is not going to let them come and take over the city like they have in other parts of the country." He added that his organization will concentrate on the city council elections next year.

Gay activists see little threat of a homophobic election victory. "If (the homophobes) have the same sophistication in working on the City Council campaigns that they showed in their own campaign, it would be very good news for us," said CUA's Steve Thomas. "They were really awful." □

Mother church fires long-time employees

BOSTON — A long-time reporter for The Christian Science Monitor and an executive for the church's world headquarters have been fired because of their sexual orientation.

Thirty-year-old Christine Madson was called "evil and immoral" and "an adulterer" by the manager of the Christian Science Publishing Society before her dismissal January 4. She had been employed by the paper for seven years, and has the unanimous support of her co-workers.

Jim Ogan, a 36-year-old business and cost analysis supervisor for the Buildings and Grounds Division of the church, was dismissed March 11 after nine years of employment when an anonymous letter was received by the personnel department denouncing him as a homosexual. Neither Madson nor Ogan were "out" at work, but Madson would not deny her lesbianism when accused.

Christian Science teaches that all non-procreative sex requires "healing," and affiliated churches generally exclude men and women who come out.

"Anybody who is proud of being gay, who brings a lover to church and says, 'This is my spouse,' is thrown out," says Bob McCullough of Gay People in Christian Science. "Frankly, the church is filled with gay men. But most of them are very closeted and beaten down; they are working for a 'healing'."

McCullough says women and gay men are often attracted to Christian Science "because the teachings are filled with androgyny — descriptions of God as female as well as male. In Christian Science each person must bring out the male and female within them."

Madson remains a church member and has not decided whether she will sue her former employer for wrongful dismissal. Courts have previously ruled that religious institutions have the right to hire and fire employees in accordance with their moral dogmas, and discrimination on the basis of sexual preference is not illegal in Massachusetts. Ogan has, however, launched a suit against the church for damages amounting to one year's salary.

Madson claims she didn't recognize the church's homophobia until she started working at the centre. "I've spent years thinking about the two and can't find any way that the two can't go together," she says. □

Black and white men charge ghetto racism

NEW YORK/SAN FRANCISCO — The San Francisco branch of Black and White Men Together (BWMT) has released a survey on racism in 99 of the city's gay bars. The group's New York branch has suspended its weekend picket of the Ice Palace after intervention by the state of New York's Division of Human Rights convinced the disco's owners to negotiate.

According to the survey, "Gay bars in San Francisco are highly segregated in terms of employment and patronage." The clientele of 78% of the bars surveyed was at least 88% white and 29% of the 99 bars were exclusively white. Ethnic minorities are employed mostly in bars not patronized by whites. Of 300 employees visibly on duty on the night of the survey, only 27 were non-white.

Only two of the 99 bars are exclusively non-white. Both are small Latin bars. Only 14 can be described as integrated, with a racial mix of which whites constituted between 40% and 80%.

BWMT spokesperson Jim Ivory said he hoped the survey would lead to discussions with bar owners resulting in the hiring of more members of ethnic minorities.

The picketing of the Ice Palace began last December after owners refused to commit themselves to a nondiscriminatory door policy and to apologize in writing to two black members of BWMT who were denied entry. BWMT took the case to the Human Rights Division, which organized a meeting between the two parties February 4. Although the representatives of the disco did not show up, the disco's owner subsequently agreed to negotiate with the group.

Ice Palace manager Kevin Cahill denied the disco discriminated. "We hire everything (sic) here: black people, Chinese people, lesbians, straight people... the only thing we screen for at the door is age."

John Klauder of BWMT testified that he and another black man were turned away from the disco on November 15 when they could not produce three picture IDs. At the same time whites and non-whites accompanied by whites were admitted without being "carded." □

Lesbian Sex Mafia promotes "PI" sex

NEW YORK — Lesbians who "practice, advocate or have fantasies which involve 'politically incorrect sex'" have formed a new group, the Lesbian Sex Mafia (LSM).

According to the group's press release, the LSM's bi-monthly programme for members only includes such wide-ranging subjects as "Therapeutic S/M," "Role Playing from Butch/Fem to Mommy/Daughter," "Recreational Drugs and Sex" and "Pornography: How it Changed My Life."

The group is planning a "Speak Out on Politically Incorrect Sex" to coincide with the Scholar and Feminist Conference at Barnard College this April. □

The Theatre Centre, 666 King St W, 862-0659.
- The Club. Another production of Eve Merriam's play. Sends up male views of women by having women take the parts of men in an exclusive turn-of-the-century male club. Through May 1, 8:30 pm. Alumnae Theatre, 70 Berkeley St, 364-4170.
- Bloopers. This crazed group of drag queens, proprietors of the Nuclear Laundry, get sent by the Queen on a cultural exchange programme to the moon. Lunacy, sexual satire, lust in space, conformity computers, tap dancing, a paean to androgyny — expect it all from Bloopers. Co-produced by Stage! and CFNY-FM. Tues-Sun. Through May 2 at 8 pm. Special Sat late show 11 pm and Sun show 3 pm. Bathurst St Theatre, 736 Bathurst St. Tickets at Box Office (595-5088) or BASS (698-2277).

□ Tom Kneebone. A cabaret performance by one of Toronto's established cabaret performers. The Mainstage, 251 Sherbourne St. 365-9972. Tues-Sun, through May 16. Two shows nightly at 8:30 and 11 pm. Sunday showbrunch from 12 noon.

□ The Desert Song. A "pocket version" of the Harbach/Hammerstein/Romberg operetta, in the style of last year's version of Rose Marie. Romance in the desert, where the bandit Riffs strikes terror in the hearts of the locals. Previews begin May 19; opening May 27. At the Royal George Theatre as part of the Shaw Festival, Niagara-on-the-Lake. 361-1544 (Toronto direct line).

□ Arlene Meadows and David Walden. Toronto comedy and singing revue team. The Mainstage, 251 Sherbourne St. 365-9972. Tues-Sun, May 19-June 6. Preview May 18.

□ Camille. A revival of Robert David MacDonald's three-focus version of the Camille story — history, theatre and opera. Last year's production was superbly theatrical, and this year's once again features Goldie Semple in the title role. The play also has several gay characters. Previews May 21, 22, 26; opens May 28. In repertory with other productions at the Shaw Festival, Niagara-on-the-Lake, through August 1. 361-1544 (Toronto direct line).

□ Funeral Games and The Good and Faithful Servant. Two short plays by Joe Orton, originally written as television plays for the BBC. One play deals with the problems of aging and working; the other is about a TV evangelist who tries to kill his wife. The productions are by a new theatre company, Schrödinger's Cat. May 25-30, 8 pm. The Theatre Centre, 666 King St W. 862-0659.

□ Let My People Come. A musical about sex, including some lesbian and gay material. Basin St Cabaret, 180 Queen St W. Mon-Thurs, 8 pm; Fri-Sat, 8 and 11 pm. 598-3013. Unlimited run.

Cinema Michael Wade

Current

□ Partners. Dir: James Burrows. With Ryan O'Neal, John Hurt. Two cops are duty-bound to "impersonate homosexuals" in order to infiltrate a gay community and solve a murder. The vulgar premise is that hot topics like "gay murders" and lipping lavender make for frolicsome comedy. Famous Players Theatre to be announced.

□ Personal Best. Dir: Robert Towne. With Mariel Hemingway. A precision piece in which a lesbian pentathlon athlete struggles to prove herself as both a lover and competitor. Presented with sober grace and fine strength, although the David Hamilton-esque photography borders on titillation. Uptown Three, Yonge at Bloor. 922-3113.

□ Making Love. Dir: Arthur Hiller. With Michael Ontkean, Kate Jackson. This teary rendition of a married man's coming out has become this year's richest resource of cocktail chatter. As attractive and respectable as a Lacoste shirt — and about as bland. Uptown Backstage One, Yonge at Bloor. 922-3113.

□ Boys in the Band. Dir: William Friedkin. This filmed staging of a gathering of New York queens at a calamitous birthday party was widely condemned by gay activists when it first appeared in 1970. A cultural artifact that deserves to be unearthed to see how we understand ourselves — and the film — now. Eaton Centre Cineplex. One Dundas St W. 396-3456.

□ Richard's Things. Dir: Anthony Harvey. With Liv Ullman, Amanda Redman. Lesbianism as metaphor. A man's death brings together his wife and his mistress for the first time. They soon find themselves in love, adrift in a deluge of affected symbolism and tidy paradoxical dialogue. But their love is only a surrogate for their longing for the dead man. Carlton Cineplex, Carlton St. 396-3456.

□ Victor/Victoria. Dir: Blake Edwards. A fizzy, elaborate farce with Julie Andrews as a chanteuse posing as a Polish count cum drag queen, James Garner as a tough guy gangster who falls uncomfortably in love with him/her and Robert Preston as her gutsy gay guardian angel. Didactic without being ponderous, it's worth ten Making Love's. Sheraton Centre One, Queen St W opposite City Hall. 864-1412.

□ Deathtrap. Dir: Sidney Lumet. With Christopher Reeve, Michael Caine. A slap-happy thriller whose complications have just begun when two gay lovers bump off the unnecessary wife who comes between them. Uptown One, Yonge at Bloor. 922-3113.

□ The Devil's Playground. Dir: Fred Schepisi. With Simon Burke, John Diedrich. "Your body is your worst enemy," a priest warns in this rambling diatribe about sexual repression in a recklessly Catholic boys' school. Although the pubescent students titillate on and on about things sexual, the extent to which the film wants their desires fulfilled is left unclear. Carlton Cinemas, 20 Carlton St. 269-3456.

□ Visiting Hours. Dir: Jean-Claude Lord. With Lee Grant. A Canadian-made shocker. After a female newscaster editorializes some liberal-feminist sentiments on air, she receives eerie death threats from a woman-hating psychopath who wishes to film her being murdered. Opens May 21, Theatre TBA.

Repertory

□ United Artists Showcase. With MGM having bought United Artists from Transamerica, they have now assembled a two-month series of films from the UA archives that will run until the end of May. The result is an eclectic mixture of movies which includes: Fellini's hysterically erotic Satyricon (May 7 at 9:25 pm), Some Like It Hot (May 8, 9:30 pm) featuring Jack Lemmon in joyous drag; R W Fassbinder's parody of Nazi excess, Lili Marleen May 9, 6:30 pm and 9 pm); the rowdy eroticism of Pasolini's Decameron (May 19, 7:15 pm); some New York homo-greasiness from Midnight Cowboy (May 20, 7 pm); and an inventive double bill of sexual and emotional entrapment, Sunday Bloody Sunday (May 29, 7:25 pm) and Women in Love (May 29, 9:30 pm). $3.50. The Revue Cinema, 400 Roncesvalles.

without a tear or trauma in sight. This show doesn't explain the pink triangle, it wears it — in yards and yards of fluorescent borg.

Clothes, it is said, make the man. Well, Bloolips costumes make much more — androgynous clowns whose tacky pantomime throws into high relief the fakery of consumer culture. Bloolips are the bag ladies of glamour, rummaging through the garbage of our entertainment industry to display its lies and truths. They reduce the politics of costume to new lows while they fly us to the moon and back.

Bravo Bloolips! Play it again, sham.

LAST MONTH

Both sides now

An Evening by Sky Gilbert. Factory Theatre Lab, April 3-4.

"How do you turn an evening into a work of art... a play...?" the fretful Lover asks in the opening moments of Sky Gilbert's An Evening, presented in a series of "Brave New Works" by Buddies in Bad Times Productions.

Mixing doses of Pirandello and Brecht, Gilbert's new theatre piece (with lively musical insertions created by Micah Barnes) examines, from a number of conflicting points of view, the romantic implications of a single evening's encounter between two gay men. The older Lover (he's 26!) can't resist turning a "beautiful and feathery" 22-year-old into his fantasy of a perfect Lovee, dreaming that their single (and rather dull) date marks the inception of an ecstatic affair. Naturally, the prosaic resistance of the young man undermines this rapture.

Gilbert constantly plays with our sympathies, turning them towards and against each character, refusing to villainize either the possessive Lover or the elusive Lovee. The latter reveals that he too has anxieties, in such amusing numbers as "I'm Perfect" and the torchy "Tall Boys."

Gilbert neatly sidesteps the usual excesses of preachiness or cuteness to explore ways in which gays often fall victim to their own fantasies. Monogamous possession, infatuation and sexual objectification are all thoughtfully dissected by Gilbert's sharp wit. He combines the romantic conventions of The Music Man with the harder-edged self-revelation of A Chorus Line to question the dubious values and platitudes which gays have absorbed from such popular entertainments.

With the help of James Plaxton's fitting module designs and the assured performances of two talented actors, Andrew MacBean and Greg Campbell, playwright Gilbert forces us to confront the strangely funny and often painful gap between our romantic yearnings and harsher truths. Paul Baker

Black success

Rude Noises (for a blank generation) Theatre Passe Muraille, April.

The faded singing of fey blonde Petula Clark ("Downtown") deceptively opens this bitter play about sexually confused men running wild in TO. The characters have no money, no hope. They die young.

A virgin hustler wears a T-shirt glamourizing that other blonde, Marilyn Monroe. A pair of Scarborough runaways hit the Yonge Street strip in search of sex, fun, drugs and Brenda, the missing sister of one of the boys, who is a naive romantic stud in a ripped black T-shirt. The handsome ingenue Eddy (Lawrence King Phillips) learns about Montreal, 1916: How is a smart, sensitive seventeen-year-old beginning to discover her lesbianism, to find kindred spirits? With lots of imagination and not a little courage, one woman found a way.

Elsa Gidlow

"I believe that part of the lesbian temperament is that we are — those of us who are conscious of it, at any rate — more creative in our souls than in our bodies. I never wanted to have children, never wanted to be a mother. But from the earliest time that I can remember, I wanted to write poetry. That was my creative expression. That was what meant most to me in life."

Elsa Gidlow, now 83 years old, spoke these words in 1978 while being filmed for the Mariposa Film Group's documentary, Word is Out. They are clearly words she has lived by; throughout her long life she has given ample rein to her creativity. Without benefit of formal education, she has produced hundreds of poems, numerous short stories and several poetry-dramas and novels. Some of these works have remained unpublished; others she, in the same independent spirit that informs her writing, has published herself. Naiad Press is to distribute her latest work, Sapphic Songs: Eighteen to Eighty, an enlarged edition of her collection of lesbian love poetry written over a period of sixty years, originally published in 1976.

She lives on a stretch of land in the hills of California's Marin County, just north of the Golden Gate. Acquired more than

The dreariness of typing shipping advices eight hours a day, six and a half days a week had become barely endurable. In my despondency I was so withdrawn even from the respite of pranks and limmerick-making that my work associates teased me about being in love. "Who is he?" they kept asking. And I, scornfully: "There is no he." The assumption, for them, was the obvious one. Into the monotony of the days they injected what relief they were able with flirting. Between the half-dozen women and the greater number of men, including those who came through with errands or requests from the yards or machine shops, there was a perpetual atmosphere of sensual potential. The two women with desks next to mine whose husbands were overseas exuded amorous need.

Blonde, blousy Mollie Simms and Nellie Pritchard, who had a plain, Cockney earthiness, in undertones while they typed bewailed having to go to bed alone. "Dribble, dribble, dribble, what do you do when there is nothing to put in there — stick something in yourself?" And Mrs Simms, lugubriously: "What fun is that, no one behind it. My feet get cold, too, without him."

The machine shop workers who came by with their lists of needed parts sensed the sexual aura like tomcats, but in the wives, ingrained virtue of sorts and patriotic loyalty to their "fighting men" kept it all on a level of tension that was expressed mainly in ribald verbal exchanges that introduced me to new sorts of language.

French-Canadian Davilla Benoit, whom I liked best, had a different approach to life's basics. Slight, dark, sinewy, widowed or divorced, she talked with unself-conscious gaiety of her lover, Jack.

Lightheartedly, she told of their nights together, whether their lovemaking had been good or not-so-good, told of their spats and making up, always with a humorous tenderness, however frank, and with no coarseness. We heard how he brought her gifts or took her out to a special dinner and theatre to win her back when he had behaved in a way to annoy her. "I just let that happen sometimes, it keeps it interesting. He always apologizes, he wants me so much. A man will do anything if he has a hard-on." She would laugh gaily, never breaking the rhythm of her expert typing: "He knows I can't do without him either." It sounded to me so very different from marriage. In that working-class environment no one appeared disturbed by the liaison.

The specific and physical confidences of these middle-aged women were for me another sort of education, but, like so forty years ago, complete with a "decrepit summer cottage" which, after learning amateur carpentry, she fixed up herself, this has become Druid Heights, her home. Here she has raised goats, still grows her own vegetables and, with a group of younger women, makes plans for a retreat there for "beleaguered, loving and creative women."

Here as well, she writes. The last few years have been spent on her memoirs. "I'd rather be working on a novel I have also started," she says, "but everyone seems to want the autobiography."

Understandably. Only in the last dozen years has it become relatively easy for us as gay people to reach out to each other, beyond our own small circles of acquaintances, to find out who we are and how we live. We know more (though, really, not much) of each other than any other generation of lesbians and gay men in history. But how many of us yet know that history? How many know what life might have been like for a sensitive sixteen-year-old discovering her lesbianism and reaching out for others like herself in the east end of Montreal during the First World War?

"To my younger sisters who continually ask, What was it like when you were young so long ago, I can only reply: It was like jumping naked into an ocean knowing only imperfectly how to swim."

Born in England in 1898, Elsa Gidlow came to Canada with her parents at the age of six. They first settled in a small village, moving to Montreal when she was fifteen. She took her first job a year later in the offices of the Canadian Pacific Railroad's Angus Machine Shops. "I had to find ways to relate to my fellow workers at Angus, and one way was to write verses on their worst grumbles or on office happenings, lampooning the rules and requirements governing our employment." She gained a reputation for practical jokes; once, finding a mouse trapped in a carton, she impertinently stuck it in a drawer of the chief clerk's desk and waited for him to open it. Later she was to recall the mouse's frantic efforts to escape — and to devise a few of her own.

In Montreal she also fell in love with her "best friend," Frances. Elsa wrote poems "about her eyes like bits of smiling sky on a sunny day, her red-gold hair and graceful body" — but lost Frances to the jingoism of an Empire at war (which Elsa detested) and to the "romance" of a young man in uniform.

In 1920, she left Montreal for Manhattan, "to seek 'fame' and friends, but with no hope of 'fortune.'" It was an early step along the road that would lead her through the rich and independent life she still lives.

An early step — but not the first. That had come in 1917. That story Elsa Gidlow tells here.

much already, I could not relate it to myself. Over Celine Droualt, also French-Canadian, the talk flowed as over snow without warming it. The pale, soft-voiced girl, maybe a year older than myself, reiterating her felt vocation of becoming a nun, definitely was not interested in the beau they also teased her with until they ceased in the face of her unaltered tranquillity. Towards me, it was a different matter. I plainly was not convent material. ("Not with your bedroom eyes," Davilla tried laughingly to draw out confession, "I bet he loves your devilment.... Oh, come on, you can't hide it.")

My truthful, "I am not interested in men," made them laugh and tease the more. They did not believe me but could not make me out. They could see that I more or less ignored the men in the office beyond the necessary interchanges. I would not have rejected male companionship, but soon I decided there was not a man there with whom I could hold a conversation about anything except what was described in the shipping advices, certainly none who thought poetry or poets were important.

There was one other woman in the office, Rebecca Stuart, who aroused my curiosity. She was muscular, handsome, with a strong voice and hearty laugh. Above us in office status, she sat on a high stool at a sloping desk and did bookkeeping. She joked more with the men than with the women, but like one of them, not flirtatiously. Each day at the lunch hour she would be on the telephone for a long time, speaking low, tender-sounding, in a voice quite different from her jovial office tone and manner. When she hung up, there was a soft look in her eyes. One evening a remarkably lovely young woman with red-gold hair and a gorgeous figure (as the men's eyes attested) came to call for Rebecca. They walked out with closely linked arms pressed against one another's sides.

The following morning I could not forebear saying to Rebecca: "What glorious hair your friend has" (thinking, with pain, "like Frances").

Rebecca glowed as if I had complimented her: "Ah she's a winner."

The visitor, like a ray of glory in the drab office, had aroused envious attention from the men. It surprised me to overhear disparaging remarks about Rebecca, with whom all of them previously had seemed to be on such comradely terms. There were peculiar snickers, whispers. From one, a Scot: "Sure, and ye know, don't ye, she's a mofredite."

That was how I heard it. With all my attention to dictionaries, my widening reading and study of the encyclopedia, never had I come across such a word. I hunted now and could find nothing resembling it, although I tried various spellings. It was not until a year later, looking through a volume of photographs of ancient Greek statuary, that the word "hermaphrodite" leapt to my eyes. I realized it was of that that I must have heard an ignorant pronunciation. Putting it together with the personality of Rebecca and the leer with which the man had mouthed the word, I guessed it must have been used as a slur on the woman's supposed masculinity. Something to puzzle over the more — until nearly a year later I took a step that catapulted me into a more sophisticated human environment.

Before then there were months of dejected aching, in body and heart and with fury of mind at what appeared to me as sordid grown-up life. I felt myself at some extremity, like the mouse dropped by what malevolence or chance into the carton, in darkness and frustration, struggling to climb the sides. At that point, two resolutions were born, written and underlined in the journal I kept spasmodically: I am going to get a room of my own. I am going to find my kind of people.

The resolve was made, like casting a net blind into unknown waters. How bait Fate's hook?

The seventy-five dollars a month had looked large. When I calculated paying the rent and supporting myself entirely, it shrank to nothing, especially as I was sharing it at home to help Mother. I wished to continue doing that. The impossibility of going to college, lacking both money and the preliminary schooling, had to be accepted. It must be added that I lacked also the bodily robustness that can make obstacles and hardships no more than incentive to overcome them. Since none of us went to doctors or had physical examinations when I was young, I did not learn until years later that my heart was not strong. The colds, bronchitis, influenza that plagued me were treated with home remedies or ignored and taken for granted. Survival had always required a stoicism of which Mother was a prime example. There was no model or encouragement for self-pity. What happened was the human condition.

But let us bless books, poets, artists, music-makers of all sorts. As I found greater access to them, they taught me that drabness, tedium, injustice were not the whole of life, that there were worlds of high-hearted realities, of spiritual transcendence. No angels with flaming swords were guarding entrance to those worlds against those who dared the adventure of claiming citizenship.

The young, and maybe their elders as well, tend to believe that what they seek is somewhere else. It was my faith then that if I could travel I should begin to discover the wider life, the more challenging and rewarding experiences, the people informed by wisdom and love of beauty that reading convinced me existed. Today, the imagination of the young bounds out into space for realization of a science-fiction sort of fantasy. Earlier, in the United States, it was continental exploration and down-to-earth pioneering that fed imagination. I am of the sea-going English and of an earlier generation when oceans were the perilous, little known routes to ports of glamour. Ships and seas were always the content of my dreams.

The fall of the year was and is my most restless time, as if I have in me some urge to seasonal migration. One autumn day of special desperation and loneliness, I said to Davilla Benoit as we ate our sandwich lunch, "I am going to run away to sea." Of course that was very funny for a girl. She simply smiled. I knew that this expedient for exploring the great beckoning world, open to moneyless young men, was denied to me because of my sex. Yet so persistently did it haunt my imagination that I thought of cutting off my hair, wearing male garb and "signing on" as cabin boy on a ship bound for any port of Orient or Antipodes. Simply to be sailing the unknown seas was lure enough, they were so much in my night dreams. Jeer at my romantic, ignorant projecting and tell me I should first explore my own inner ocean. I was doing that too, though holding the feeling that Life with a capital L was "out there."

Hallowe'en came. My sisters, brother Stanley and I always had devised masks and costumes to go masquerading with our pumpkin lanterns on All Hallows' Eve. This year I let them go alone. Stanley, though younger, had caught up with me in height. His clothes would just about fit me. I borrowed some old ones, wound and pinned my abundant hair up tightly, stuffed it into a cap of Father's and went bare-faced to call on Davilla. It thrilled me that a black-eyed French girl on the streetcar kept looking at me as if flirting. I was too shy to do more than smile.

Davilla laughed heartily when she realized I was seriously considering the adventure I had threatened. "Whether the captain thinks he sees a girl or a pretty boy, he will quickly discover for himself a delightful adventure. You will not very long be a virgin."

That possibility — rape — had not occurred to me. With discouragement I listened as Davilla took me to her tall mirror. "Look — your delicate figure — hands — lady's hands, so pretty — eyes — you think a young man would have such a mischievous smile? — and your voice! Ma petite, you may not be born to make babies — I am not, either, but you are all woman. You cannot deceive."

I had to admit that, although I might appear a bit boyish, there was nothing masculine about me. I never had wanted to be male, only to be free to do things men could do. Now I know there have been not a few women who dared the male masquerade to achieve the freedom they were denied, many succeeding lifelong, but they may have been more convincingly male-featured. I was forced to admit the impossibility of getting on a ship to discover wider, more shining horizons — for the present at least, until I could buy a ticket. But I would not be defeated. I devised a bait and cast my net into nearer unknown waters to bring to me what I might not yet go in search of.

In the late autumn of 1917, a letter appeared in the people's column of the Montreal Daily Star. It inquired if any group or organization of writers and artists existed in the city which a person seriously interested in such pursuits might join. There was no reply, but a little more than a week later a second letter appeared responding to the first. It stated that a group of writers was being formed, and suggested that the inquirer and any others interested should "communicate with the undersigned at the address given."

Both letters were written by that lonely young woman — groping towards her kind, the first under a pseudonym. Over the course of a week I received nearly a dozen replies from individuals of both sexes asking for information about the proposed group. I invited them all to a meeting at my parents' on an evening when Father would be away, telling Mother what I was doing. With the help of my sister Thea, who was also interested, I made the little parlour as tidy and attractive as I could, bought flowers, asked Mother if she would bake some sweet buns and added a bottle of port wine.

An odd assortment of people came, all declaring interest in writing except one gentle-mannered Jew who said he was a painter. A large, blonde, lame woman was helped up the two flights of steps to our flat by her husband, who left saying he would return for her at ten. She was crippled with arthritis, passed her time writing and trying to sell short stories to women's magazines. There was a pretty, freckled, red-haired girl, Edith Strachan, not much older than myself, who had won prizes for writing at school. A man in a lieutenant's writing techniques. The lieutenant, who obviously could barely contain his horror and distaste for Mills, failed to show up at the next meeting, scheduled for Mills's home (he lived with his parents).

The arthritic woman, Maisie McBane, arrived faithfully at all of the weekly gatherings, escorted by her husband until he rebelled. Then she appealed to Edith or me to pick her up at her home in an outlying part of the city and help her on and off the streetcars. All of us found her tiresome, her sentimental stories boring, her conventional attitudes a restraint on conversation. For a time I acquiesced, without enthusiasm, to the demand for escort service. It meant I had to rush home from work and bolt dinner without a moment's pause. The McBane's house was more than half an hour by streetcar, forty minutes from there to the Mills's where we most often gathered. One night I rebelled and told a lie. "I am not feeling very well," I told her on the telephone. "I don't think I'll be going."

"When I arrived at the meeting, Roswell said, "Thank God she's not coming. I was getting ready to shock the wits out of her by announcing I should like to make love to her son. Did you know she has a quite good-looking boy of seventeen or so? I met them on the street one Saturday. Now if she would have him bring her...."

The doorbell rang. It was Mrs McBane. She stared at me and turned chilly. "I thought you weren't coming."

Feeling badly that she would guess now we did not want her, I tried to save the situation. "I was tired after a hard day's work, but took a rest and felt better, so I came anyway."

Maisie, looking aggrieved, eased herself into the most comfortable armchair, reposing her cane at her feet, muttering that young people no longer cared to help a poor crippled woman. Roswell, floating past her to the kitchen, sweetly asked, "Did your son bring you? He is such a pretty boy. I'd like to know him."

Maisie turned red. "There is a vicious young man. I am coming to the conclusion I do not belong here." She left early, refusing tea which Edith passed around with the cake uniform from some other part of Canada diffidently confided he thought his experiences in the war might be exciting to write about when he returned from fighting to save democracy. Doris Reid also came with her husband, who left her there and departed; originally from England, she had lived in India. A number of middle-aged men came primarily hoping to find amorous companionship, attracted by the female name signed to the second letter. The one exception was Alfred Gordon; he arrived with a fat sheaf of typewritten verse which he said would come out as a book when he had collected the retail price of its publication from two hundred sponsors. He was ready with sign-up sheets and promised to honour us with a reading later in the evening.

The most astonishing of all was a being of elegance and beauty, a willowy blond: "God made him for a man so let him pass as such," Gordon quoted in sibilant sotto voce to the lieutenant. The anomalous being ("Roswell George Mills," he announced himself, "of the Montreal Star") overheard Gordon's quotation from Shakespeare and gave him a supercilious stare. The remark was spiteful and uncalled-for. I could not blame its target for as spiteful a retaliation when the opportunity arose. At the point in the evening when Gordon proposed starting his reading, Mills vetoed it and won support from the rest. "Let's get to know one another first. We are not, I assume, gathered here to begin by boring one another to death."

R G Mills of the Star, the shy Scottish girl, Edith, the Jewish artist whose name was Gershon Benjamin, Mrs Reid from India and possibly the poet, Gordon, were the only members of the group who appeared promising. All the middle-aged men left early, put off by the indifference to their advances of the two young women and bored by talk of

Instead of accepting society's rejection, we two iconoclasts rejected our rejectors, proud to be the spiritual and passionnal kin of Sappho, the Shakespeare of the Sonnets, Jesus, Michelangelo and hundreds more whose secret lives we ferreted out from forbidden chronicles.

Elsa Gidlow's autobiography, tentatively titled Elsa: A Life from Oblique Angles, is still in progress. Book One, which covers her life up to the time she moved to New York, and from which this piece is excerpted, is complete; Ms Gidlow is now working on the next volume.

Elsa Gidlow's work has appeared in many magazines, among them Soujourner, Frontiers, and Feminist Studies. Inquiries concerning Elsa Gidlow can be addressed to The Body Politic, Box 7289, Station A, Toronto, Ontario M5W 1X9. Attention: Rick Bébét.

Roswell had made. To our surprise, she managed nicely alone, limping out and down the stairs with the aid of her cane. Roswell turned from watching her through the living-room curtains. "Do you realize she came here without help and is leaving the same way? It a-Maisies me she has the gall to expect you to go all the way out to Westmount to fetch her and take her back." There was laughter and a couple of groans at his pun. But I still felt badly, both about the lie and having hurt the woman's feelings, although I was convinced I had been justified. With fiercely youthful intolerance I burst out, "People should not be boring and ugly and pitiable, making others feel like beasts for not catering to them." It was the last we saw of her.

Gradually a wide variety of individuals joined us: musicians, medical students, painters, amateur actors and some out-of-work professionals, but interesting, men. At last I had found people I could enjoy, converse with, learn from and perhaps love. The most interesting to me was Roswell. He was only nineteen, but older in his mind and in experience. Conscious also of being an "outsider" and of the need to compensate for it, he worked hard despite his languid manner. His main interest was music; he took piano lessons and practised tirelessly to a ticking metronome. His job on the Star was assisting the editor of the financial page. On the side he conducted a lovelorn column where, cynical tongue in cheek, he gave very proper counsel under a female name. And he found time to write music and drama criticism, which brought him free passes to the city's cultural events. To some of these he took me when there was no likely young man to court or impress. I thus enjoyed my first concerts, operas, theatrical productions, to which I could rarely have afforded tickets. A marvellous new world opened.

Besides these events and people, Roswell also introduced me to a whole new range of literature I might not so quickly have discovered, along with the lives of its makers: Oscar Wilde and Alfred Douglas, Baudelaire, Verlaine, Mallarmé, Swinburne, Maeterlinck, Max Beerbohm, Joris Karl Huysmans. All were bourgeois-scoring, "decadent" rebels of the Nineties and early Twenties with their glamorous sinfulness or metaphysical retreat from unendurable middle-class living. Haunting libraries, I made discoveries of my own: Nietzsche, whose Thus Spake Zarathustra transported me to delirious heights of recognition; de Quincy's Confessions of an English Opium Eater which roused in me a desire to make like experiments. When I found small brown tablets of opium among Father's first-aid supplies, I stole some and hid them away for later experimentation. I studied French by myself on streetcars so as to be able to read in the original Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du Mal, excited to find him writing of love, passionate love, between women.

Roswell confided to me his personal crusade. He wanted people to understand that it was beautiful, not evil, to love others of one's own sex and make love with them. Roswell had divined my lesbian temperament and was happy to proselytize; the veil of self-ignorance began to lift. Together we read Havelock Ellis's Psychology of Sex, and other such volumes (available mainly to the medical profession) as we were able to get our hands on. We read Edward Carpenter's The Intermediate Sex and his Towards Democracy. I still have a copy of that thin India paper volume, much marked.

A new member of our group, Louis Gross, a graduate medical student from McGill University, helped us to get access to some of the forbidden books. He introduced us to Krafft-Ebing, Guy Lombroso, who argued that "genius" was decadent, to Freud and Albert Einstein. Try to grasp how explosive all of this was to a young mind in 1916. I began to look for books on psychology to seek deeper understanding of why I had always felt myself an "outsider" in ordinary life.

Roswell developed an unrequited love for the young medical student who did not walk the lavender path, and lamented to me at length of his sufferings. He relieved them writing plays celebrating erotic love between men, in the mood of Maeterlinck. He wrote of the tragedy inherent in the scorn and persecution with which this love was met by a crass society. The trial and jailing of Oscar Wilde were not far in our past and very real. We read his Ballad of Reading Gaol. Tragedies of Sex by Frank Wedekind was another of the books that instructed us in the cruelties of society to those who did not walk in its prescribed paths.

In response to Roswell's confidences about his unhappy love life, I in turn told him of the feelings I had had for Frances. I spoke of her "betrayal," now recognizing that I had been "in love." At this point Roswell told me of Sappho. I went searching for all I could find of her translated fragments, not much, and anything written about her, also scarce at the time. Instead of accepting society's rejection, we two iconoclasts rejected our rejectors, proud to be the spiritual and passionnal kin of Sappho, the Shakespeare of the Sonnets, Jesus, Michelangelo, Leonardo da Vinci, Carpenter, Walt Whitman, and hundreds more of the world's admired individuals whose secret lives we ferreted out from forbidden chronicles. We delved into the mores of Ancient Greece, read Plato's dialogues, dreamed of an ideal society as we studied his Republic. In all of this and more we found reasons for loving ourselves and each other.

I thought Roswell was the most ambiguously beautiful being I knew, with his metallic blond hair and pale, perfect features, his languidly intelligent grey eyes and soft, slim body; he was a hothouse beauty, like a living flower that appeared artificial. He went scrubbed in tweeds to his work on the newspaper, but at home among friends, at the theatre and concerts, he was delicately made-up and elegantly dressed, wearing exotic jewelry and as colourful clothes as he dared. Receiving at home, he donned a bronze green robe of heavy silk. He gently maintained that it was necessary to startle the bourgeoisie, not for the sake of shocking but to shake them out of their smugness, make them realize they were half alive and doing their best to destroy all who did not fit into their mould. "Greasy domesticity" was not godly but a blight. In one way or another, every generation repeats such revolt. Older men had been Roswell's mentors when he was younger. I also was grateful to them for helping to open up the worlds of thought and art.

I inquired one day how Roswell had escaped being drawn into the maw of war. "Oh, I'm Four-F — physically, mentally, emotionally and morally incompetent for the glory of killing," he explained. Mabel, his mother, was most relieved not to have borne a soldier. "My father can't stand the sight of me; it's mutual. He's in the last stages of alcoholism: sclerosis of the liver, poor idiot. No wonder Mabel couldn't endure it any longer and took a lover."

I had seen the man who was Mabel's lover and imagined him to be a relative of some sort. Mabel was as beautiful as her son, with the same colouring but voluptuous and healthy like one of Titian's women. She dressed smartly; her son helped design her clothes. They were more like elder sister and brother than mother and son and went out a lot together. They shared cosmetics. She accepted him as he was.

Wishing to add sophistication to my unassuming appearance, Roswell designed for me a draped, goddess-like, close-fitting evening dress, which I sewed. He suggested I carry a calla lily with it when we went to concerts or receptions of friends together. I balked at that Wildean extravagance. He also tried to persuade me to use make-up, but I could not be bothered. It was fun occasionally to "dress up" for a dramatic appearance, but generally I was too preoccupied with writing. I preferred to be admired for my mind and what it could accomplish. "One can also be beautiful," he argued. "You didn't even know you had beautiful hands, the most beautiful I have seen." He wrote poetry to them and other supposed charms.

Some of the other young men also were flattering. Gereshon, the painter, said I was beautiful and he wished to paint me. Louis, a sculptor, told me, "You have a Burne-Jones body and a Rosetti neck," reciting Dante Gabriel Rosetti's lines: "The blessed damozel leaned out/From the gold bar of heaven...."

Roswell gave me the pet name of Sappho ("You are strong and independent like her and a true poet"). The others picked it up and it was my name among them for years until I left Montreal. All heady and romantic — but I knew I was not pretty; there was nothing remarkable about my appearance. "No, you are not pretty, thank God," Roswell said, "but you are an individual. Make the most of it. Learn how to dress. I'll help you." The situation at least was pleasant and added to my self-confidence.

Roswell and I became inseparable, feeling, if not altogether knowing why, that we complemented one another, loving with a pure, Platonic love. His gender ambiguity both attracted me and left me feeling safe. I was constantly defending him to people, mainly men, who regarded him as corrupt. He could have a viper's tongue against those he disliked, against smugness and persons who went out to their way to insult him, as was not infrequent, but I knew him for a loyal, gentle and generous friend, one to whom I already owed a great deal and was to owe more. Our friendship was to be lifelong.

Fascinating fish my homemade net had caught. Whatever contributed to my devising remains unanalyzable. But from that action in a desperate moment I learned never to tolerate stagnation. Even in the most deprived circumstances it is possible to proclaim: "I am here, world: where are you? What do you want of me?"

The rest of my life depended on the threads of that innocently cast net. □

Upsetting convention with Mary Poppins

Victor/Victoria. Directed by Blake Edwards. MGM/United Artists, 1982

The direct social effect of a film (in so far as it can be guessed) has no necessary correlation with its interest as a work of art. For example, we think Cruising, whose social effect was probably entirely negative, a far more interesting film than Making Love, whose social effect must be predominantly positive. The former draws on a rich legacy from the horror movie and film noir and can be read as a radical critique of authority patterns in contemporary culture, while the latter has little more complexity or resonance than a made-for-TV "social problem" drama. What, then, are the criteria of value?

Happily, such quandaries of evaluation are largely resolved by Victor/Victoria, at once the most pleasurable, the most widely accessible, the most complex, the most intelligent, the most fundamentally serious and the most radical of the recent outcrop of Hollywood movies on gay themes. (Which is not to say it's perfect — we'll return later to its quite important limitations.)

As for discernible social effect, the film consistently reverses the general conditioning of audiences to laugh at or despise homosexuals from the secure vantage point of identification with "straight" male characters, and the huge audiences currently flocking to the film seem, for the most part, triumphantly won over by it. Consider the following: early in the film Richard (Malcolm Jamieson), who has been sexually exploiting Toddy (Robert Preston) and is now walking out on him, calls him an "old queer"; in spontaneous response Victoria (Julie Andrews) erupts from a closet to punch him in the face and literally boot him out of the apartment. On the two occasions we saw the film, the audience laughed delightedly and applauded. The response was similar when Norma (Lesley Ann Warren), the stereotypical "dumb blonde," tells Toddy that she thinks a good woman could reform him, and he retorts that he thinks a good woman could reform her. By the later stages of the film anything becomes possible, and the audience can take in its stride the magnificent moment when James Garner's bodyguard (Alex Karras, a wonderfully delicate performance), thinking he has found his macho boss in bed with another man, promptly "comes out" and, tears in his eyes, kisses him.

What is most remarkable about the film is its completely successful fusion of delight and didacticism; it manages to be at once a continuously inventive and captivating musical farce and a veritable sermon on sexuality, gayness and gender-identity, without either facet undermining the other. Seldom has "entertainment" been so effectively used as a means of educating the audience. It is especially important that the most explicit radical statements are given to Julie Andrews (they might be regarded as following from her splendid feminist lecture to Dudley Moore in bed in 10). Her attempts to transcend or negate her star image (in Star, for example, or the extremely underrated Darling Lili) have hitherto not been commercially successful; for most people, she remains the star of The Sound of Music and Mary Poppins, a screen persona which might well have gained the unqualified approval of Anita Bryant in her heyday. It is startling enough to be informed by a Hollywood movie that the only people who regard homosexuality as sick or sinful are "pure clergymen and terrified heterosexuals"; for such a speech to emerge from the lips of Mary Poppins is nothing short of electrifying.

Perhaps the film's most deeply satisfying achievement, however, is its creation, without fuss, pretension or self-consciousness, of a positive, happy, loving and mutually supportive relationship between a gay man and a heterosexual woman. The gains here arguably offset what initially struck us as one of the film's limitations: although Andrews (as a woman pretending to be a man pretending to be a woman) is central to its play on gender-roles and the chief spokesperson for its discussion of sexual ambiguity and defence of freedom of orientation, the character's own sexual identity is never called into question. Victoria is allowed to look and fight like a man, defending gays with words and fists, but she is never allowed to acknowledge that she might feel attracted to women. Yet the gay/feminist alliance embodied in the Andrews/Preston relationship remains one of the film's major delights. They sing and dance together, face problems together, hug, kiss, love each other, share the same bed, are regarded by the world as (male) lovers, while fully accepting each other's different sexual needs and without ever trespassing on each other's freedom of choice. In this, the film accurately reflects one of the most positive side-effects of the coalition of the gay and women's movements.

In the best tradition of the American musical, the "numbers" are consistently used, not as decorative appendages, but to crystallize themes and narrative developments. Hence, the Preston/Andrews alliance is summed up in their public duet in the club Chez Lui, a number that also extends the film's complex play on gender-identity by being posited on a double vision: the audience within the movie thinks it is watching two men, the cinema audience knows it is watching a gay man and a woman. The song asserts not only the togetherness of the couple but the idea that everyone envies such people and would like to be like them. One can take it either way.

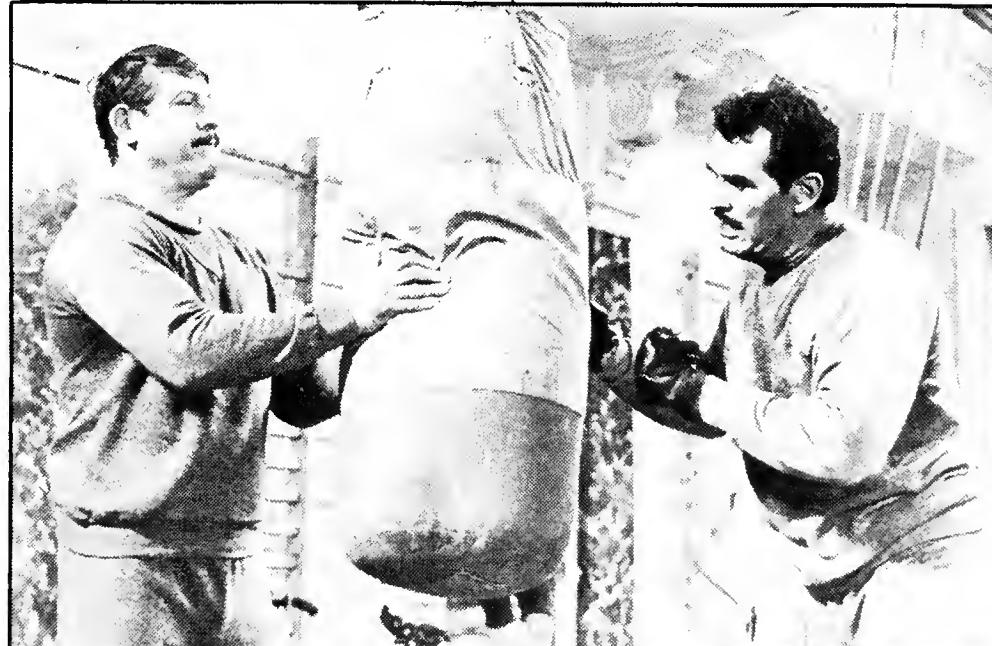

It is fitting that a film so dedicated to educating the "straight" audience should centre its narrative on the education of a "straight" male (Garner), the recipient of Victoria's lectures. One of the movie's unquestionable weaknesses is that Garner learns the truth about Andrews identity too early (and in a manner that is more distasteful than the film seems ready to acknowledge). The logic of the thematic progress is surely that he should admit to being in love with Victoria while still believing that she's a man: when he tells her he wants to kiss her and doesn't care if she's male, the potential of the moment is severely undercut by the fact that he knows she isn't. Nonetheless, the character's development (in order to continue a relationship with Victoria, he has to learn to accept that people will think he's gay) provides some of the movie's strongest moments. One of its most notable reversals of conventional assumptions is the implication that Garner finally demonstrates his strength and integrity by refusing to reveal that he isn't gay, even under extreme pressure.

As to the film's other shortcomings (though, when it goes so far and does so much, it seems ungrateful to insist on them): we are bothered somewhat by the treatment of Lesley Ann Warren (hilarious as she mostly is), or, more specifically, by the film's strategy of making a woman its ultimate butt or "fall guy." The corollary of this is the capitulation of Victoria herself to the male order against which she has previously held out.

More serious is its failure, in the last resort, to take gay relationships as seriously as heterosexual ones. It seems to us the one edge that Making Love has over Victor/Victoria — the only one, but crucially important in terms of gay politics and contemporary society — is that it confronts general audiences with the possibility that gays are capable of the same commitment, and the same pain, as heterosexuals. Edwards's film falls finally into the pattern long established in, for example, Shakespearian comedy and Mozartian opera, as well as in Hollywood movies such as the Astaire/Rogers films, whereby a "serious romantic couple is counterpointed with a comic one; here, the serious couple (Andrews and Garner) happen to be heterosexual, the comic couple (Preston and Karras) gay. Though enormously superior to it in every way, the film is not quite as far removed from La Cage Aux Folles as we would wish.

Coming to terms with power

Coming to Power: Writings and Graphics on Lesbian S/M (S/M: A Form of Eroticism Based on Consensual Exchange of Power). Edited by SAMOIS (a lesbian/feminist organization), Box 11798, San Francisco, CA 94101. 1981. $6.95.

Some whisper about it. Some accuse with it. Some are truly repulsed by the very thought of it. A few are genuinely curious. Of those asking, most have predetermined it to be Dangerous to Your Health, and if not yours, then at least to the General Public's (maybe naive but not-so-innocent) Morality. If you happen to be a lesbian and you happen to engage in it, you might easily be considered Anti-Feminist, a Pervert, a Menace, a Sickie, a Reactionary or even a Fascist. And not necessarily in that order. Not surprisingly, you will enrage the police, the right wing's fanatic Moral Majority, and even a few of our own all-too-holy and politically correct lefties. But to your shock and horror, you may also enrage many, many of your own Lesbian-Feminist Sisters — and if you do, you will be condemned by them as a Sexist Male in Female Genitalia Drag. Be prepared. Brace yourself. Allow yourself the hard-won right to experience Our Bodies! Ourselves! For as the Ministry of Truth correctly proclaims, Coming To Power "is an outrageous book." It is also a profound book. And it's the best thing that's been published on feminist theory/practice in a long, long time.

If you can actually find a copy — difficult, since the very bookstores normally carrying feminist writing waver between fear and anger about its contents or, when they don't, order such a limited amount that it sells out immediately upon arrival — you will discover or affirm many general things about sexual/erotic relations and fantasies. But you will have to come to terms with three basic lesbian things in particular: (1) that what we "do in bed" involves more than endless discussions on women's oppression, non-monogamy and guilt; (2) that what we "do in bed" involves consensual erotic sexual fantasies/activities that may or may not involve the use of leather straps, silk ropes, vibrators, orgasms, and more than one other person, and (3) that the understanding of sex as consensual, erotic, powerful and political constitutes not only the basis of S/M sexual play, but the very foundation of feminism itself.

Now sit down, catch your breath and read on.

Let's start with SAMOIS's rather appropriate title: Coming to Power. As we all know from listening to old Lenny Bruce albums, "coming" is a fun little word imbued with a variety of meanings that can include mundane things like "in the pursuit of" or "reaching toward" something. But it also carries another meaning, an erotic meaning, having to do explicitly with orgasm(s). Statements like "Are you coming?" "Did you come?" "I'm coming!" or "I came three times!" — in the right context — mean something other than can you/did you/will you meet me for lunch on Tuesday. SAMOIS is certainly not innocent of this (or any other) point. By choosing the word "coming," these lesbian-feminists underline the fact that, on the one hand, women are continuing their pursuit of power in this society, that that pursuit is solidified by getting (ie coming) together, and that that coming together (ie sisterhood) is, in itself, a serious political statement about power. Perhaps this might seem vaguely reminiscent, if we carefully blow away the layers of dust, of the old and important slogan: Sisterhood is powerful.

On the other hand, by employing "coming" they also succeed in re-establishing a key point about feminist politics often forgotten in today's struggle for women's liberation: It has something to do with Sex, a "something" that is politically liberating, exciting, strengthening and erotic. But it also re-establishes a key point about (lesbian) sexual relations and fantasies: Sex in general and lesbian sex in particular, has something definite and positive to do with power, where power is understood as erotic, sensual and socially/historically created (that is, political), rather than something to be reduced (as is often done) to the crude equation Power = Patriarchy = Male, or in short, as something anti-woman.

But although it is important to be clear about the multiplicity of meanings behind the word power, we should be equally clear that SAMOIS is not just talking about any old sisterly coming together, nor any old erotic form of power. They are talking about lesbian sado-masochistic sexual encounters. They are talking about consensual dominant/subordinate, tension/release, costume/reality, sexual relations/fantasies by, for and among women. In the full and total sense of the phrase (and in no less than thirty articles, stories and fantasies), SAMOIS debates, writes about and otherwise explores coming to power.

So let's go for that long-awaited walk on the wild side. Let's explore and debate with SAMOIS what constitutes lesbian S/M sexual play.

If you flip through articles such as

"How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love My Dildo" (Sophie Schmuckler), "Dangerous Shoes or What's a Nice Dyke Like Me Doing in a Get-up Like This?" (Virginia Barker), "Silk and Leather Dream" (Anonymous), "Act II Scene I" (Janet Schrim), "Girl Gang" (Cappy Kotz), or "Handkerchief Codes: Interlude II" one thing stands out: lesbian sado-masochism means all things to all lesbians.

Some claim, for example, that it's just a matter of tension and its release via bodily orgasms:

Slowly she takes the long red silk scarf from her pocket and lovingly wraps it around my wrists, drawing my arms up and over my head to the headboard of the bed. I lie there spread-eagled, arms out of my control, as her breasts, covered in the cool self-contained silk rub over my body... The leather against me, pushing between my legs, hard, hot, impossible to avoid, even as the silk tells me how cool and distanced she could be at any time.

Raising her knee, she grinds into my clit... On and on until the leather glistens with my juice. Another piece of silk appears and she rubs it over my breasts in ever larger circles until my sides and thighs and every part of me is drawn, electric... Her hand descends, and my legs spread wider than should be possible, as first one finger, then another and another join and pierce, pushing hard and fast, forcing bone against clit. Another finger enters my asshole — rubbing, massaging, ignoring the tightness of muscles fighting invasion. The silk keeps rubbing. Breasts, ribs, ass, never stopping until I come, and keep coming... The smell of leather filling the air, the creaking of her leather coming in time to my own cries of joy. ("Silk and Leather Dream")

Some claim, on the other hand, that

S/M sex has to do with a discovery of the body, a searching for and finding the very boundary between agony and ecstasy:

"No." More a moan than a word. The heavy strands of black braided leather bit into my ass and shoulder blades once more. And again. And again.

And my cries continued, breathless, reverberating in my throat, barely making it into the air. My body, bound and helpless, jerked at the blows, writhing without my will.

"No. Ohh." A moan trailing off into a shuddering sob...

Suddenly the whipping stopped. I felt as if I were awakening in a strange place with no recollection of how I had gotten there. A sudden stab of pain in each nipple, followed by relief, brought me back as she removed the clamps. She undid the wrist cuffs from the chains and half carried me to bed.

"We need a break," she said to me urgently. I murmured wordless agreement. Holding her holding me I felt renewed energy surging through us. I knew we weren't finished yet tonight. Curtain. ("Act II Scene I")

Then again, some claim S/M to mean more than tension and release, more than simple limitation and discovery. They claim it to mean discipline and punishment:

I'm wearing army fatigues and a form-fitting military shirt. I apply a gash of cruel red lipstick to remind her that I am all woman within my command outfit.

I put her through her paces, watching her tits jiggle, her ass sweat, her cunt drip.

Yet she's not quite sexy enough for me. Nor, really, for her own pleasure. So I put her in the cage and allow her to lick my big black boots through the bars.

When we are both thoroughly aroused I return to my bed and we listen to each other masturbate.

Later I punish her for experiencing pleasure unsuitable for a prisoner and for spying on an officer.

When I take her across my lap for her punishment she follows instructions to keep her fist in my cunt as I paddle her. She comes just seconds before I do and she is punished for preceding an officer. ("Handkerchief Codes: Interlude")

Well. You've no doubt noticed that these scenes include silk (as in ropes, scarves and shirts), paddles and nipple clamps. No doubt you also noticed they include Tops and Bottoms, Dominants and Submissives, fist-fucking, anal sex, pain, sweat, orgasms. But what you might not have grasped in its entirety is the reality/fantasy level of each scene. It's up to you to decide, to know which is which. For the question is never simply what is real or not about these sexual encounters, but what do you hope/desire to be real? This, too, is central to S/M play, the interweaving of fantasy with real-life played-out scenes.

There is one other point that may have escaped your analytic eye: the fact of mutual consent and trust necessary for each sexual encounter. For lesbian sexual S/M is not (and this should be stressed) performed against a woman's will. Moreover, it is not emotional S/M blackmail — the typical "mind-fuck" game-playing often present in lesbian relationships. Lesbian sexual "S/M is not abusive, rape, beatings, violence, cruelty, power-over, force, coercion, non-consensual, unimportant, a choice made lightly (or) growth blocking...". And, as Martha Equinox quietly adds, it's certainly not boring. People agree to do it together, consensually, and they agree to stop immediately when either partner wishes to do so.

How do you know when to stop, or if you're the Bottom, how do you let your lover/partner know you've had enough? By using code words, like "pink" for "ease it up" or "red" for "stop." How do you know whether a sex toy is safe or unsafe to use? You check it out before engaging in an S/M sex scene. After all, not every potentially erotic object is necessarily safe — this goes particularly for glass bottles (which form a vacuum in the vagina or anus and have to be surgically removed) or hard plastic dildos and vibrators that may splinter under pressure. These and other safety tips can be found in Janet Bellwether's important lesbian S/M safety guide: "Love Means Never Having to Say Oops." It is up to both (or more) partners to know exactly what they're getting into and the limits of the play. But it's particularly important for the Top to understand the complexity of each scene, since she will usually be the one with the most freedom of movement and, therefore, the one exercising continual judgment of the situation.

Lastly, how do you know if you might be into S/M if you've never tried it before? Will you want to be a Top or a Bottom, a Dominant or Submissive? Will you want to be Versatile? Are you going to want to try whipping someone or wanting yourself to be whipped? Or will you want it to be just tension/release without the use of toys or ropes? These questions do not have self-evident answers. And it is precisely because there are no pat answers that SAMOIS provides many varied personal statements about lesbian S/M. These statements often include comments about feeling nervous, curious, even scared. But even if Curiosity Killed the Cat, we all know that Satisfaction Brought Her Back. "Proper Orgy Behaviour" (by "J") testifies to this dual fear/satisfaction:

Orgy 1

Thoughts I keep to myself:

Oh jeez, look at those women over there. One is whipping the other. Uh oh and I promised myself I'd be cool and nonjudgmental... but... but... how can they do that? Why would she want to be whipped?

Oh it's just too weird. Why did I come to this orgy anyway? Me, monogamous me, who's never done a three way with friends....

Orgy 2

...there are those two women again. All that leather she's wearing. I wonder if she gets hot in it? ...I wonder what it feels like? Why is it such a turn on? Oh, it's just too weird.

Orgy 3

Listen, I know this might sound unusual coming from me, but well... I'd like to see what it feels like to be whipped!

My friends are delighted, and we find a swing board for me to lie down on. I tell them I am feeling very vulnerable and do not want any sexual play at this time, only whipping. "Only whipping" I gulp. I then tell them that my safe word for stopping the action is "red," and "pink" for lightening up.

One by one they take turns. They ask my permission first, and are loving and gentle in their manner... I am anxious. Will it hurt? Can I take it? What am I doing? I wait nervously, then... SMACK! The first hit... "Ayyy, that hurts," I protest. I am surprised at how much it stings. They laugh and I relax. So, it really does hurt.

(After several smacks with variations on the Scene:)

She says, "I think that's enough for your first time." "Oh," I say disappointedly. I want to go on.... "No, enough for now. You think you can take more but you really can't." And then she reassures me. "You can always do it again." Yes, I smile, feeling very peaceful and self-satisfied.

We are left, in the end, with a burning (shall I say stinging?) indictment, an indictment that brings us full circle to the beginning of our walk on the wild side: if lesbian S/M sex is so powerful, so interesting and so much fun, why is it not more openly talked about, let alone practised? The answer has to do, in part, with a two-pronged development within lesbian/feminist politics.

On the one hand, S/M sex is seen to be scary, often thought to be a Heterosexual Aberration of the Scars of Patriarchy, and therefore seen as something to be contained, sealed off, in a word, censored by some of the major elements within the feminist community. On the other hand, to admit to yourself and to your once cosy lesbian-feminist world that you're an S/M dyke means to come out once again, but this time in an ever more vicious atmosphere where you will definitely be discredited by the very sisters whose support you once held in high esteem. It is a maddening emotional drain. And our SAMOIS sisters are keen on presenting exactly how disturbing and how tortuous it has been for them in their uncomfortable role as the new cutting edge of the lesbian sexual liberation movement. (See in particular Gayle Rubin's excellent analysis, "The Leather Menace: Comments on Politics and S/M" reprinted in the April issue of TBP.)

But Coming to Power is more than an attempt to put sex back into lesbian politics. It is an attempt to show, through stories, graphics and analysis, just how political (ie, socially constructed) lesbian sex really is. It is an attempt to remind all of us that we must continue our fight to define sexual relations on our own terms as something valid and important. It is an attempt to remind us that the personal is political.

Only one small question remains: are you going to be part of the problem or part of the solution in the fight for the sexual liberation of women?

Dramatic tricks and dubious intentions

Deathtrap directed by Sidney Lumet. Released through Warner Brothers, 1982

A close-up of a nervous young man peering around a corner; he is afraid he is being watched. Cut to: two eyes looking out from behind a drape: he is being watched. The young man emerges from behind the wall, cradling in his arms a woman's corpse.

The camera pulls back, showing the murderer, the wall, a door... and in the foreground, a restless audience. The acting in this thriller, they mutter, is horrible — and the script worse. The voyeur behind the drapes is sweating: he is the play's author and standing at the back of the theatre he senses this production is going to bomb.

This intriguing unfolding of layers of theatrical artifice and theatrical reality is endemic in Deathtrap. Being a thriller, its success should depend on how well it creates suspense, how long it enticingly withholds the actual outcome of events, how effectively it teases us into believing in its inevitability. Yet Jay Presson Allen's screenplay isn't content to do only that: its trickery is not just a matter of concealing outcomes, but of hiding whole events.

The sweating playwright, Sidney Bruhl (Michael Caine) is devastated. Once the Neil Simon of thrillers, he is now observing the fourth in a numbing series of flops. And when he returns home to his wife Myra (Dyan Cannon), he confides to her his worst fear: he has received a script in the mail from a fan of his, an aspiring playwright, one Clifford Anderson (Christopher Reeve). It's a thriller and it's very good — perfect, in fact, so perfect that Anderson may usurp Bruhl's title of Thriller King. He must be stopped — eliminated, as it were. He is invited to Bruhl's East Hampton home so they can iron out some of the script's "small problems."

By this time, the scenario seems familiar enough as these things go: husband and wife team up to wipe out what they consider a threat to their security. But soon the machinery appears to backfire, when, through a series of shocking events, Myra is bumped off instead. Anderson is terribly pleased with this development. And Bruhl? Couldn't be happier!

The reason for their elation is nebulous at first, but when the two embrace and kiss triumphantly, the clouds quickly dissipate: after all, what a burden this woman was! That kiss discloses for us, at last, the premise that we all have been watching. The gay coupling is used as a dramatic trick, the assumption being that this is the last thing we should expect. Like the camera shots which pretend to know all the action but purposely omit important information, this deception and provocation are all part of the film's playfulness.

And Deathtrap gets up to more mischief. The two lovers soon become rival playwrights, each setting out to write the ultimate whodunit — even if one's cunning necessitates the other's demise. They threaten each other with plots, effects, props, performances — with their own scripts' outlandishly morbid clever pranks. What forges the tension and dramatic gravity here is the rivals' relationship. It is the spectre of betrayal between lovers, through professional competition and suggestions of murder, that anchors the suspense.

Not that these two have any monopoly on duplicity; every character in this film has dubious intentions. Even the screenplay is not without its chicanery. It may be that Allen is using this male-male relationship to set the complexities in bizarre, alien territory. Few things could complete this film's vertiginous atmosphere better than the sight of two men kissing and calling each other "darling" and "sweetie." Yet it is to the advantage of cheery twaddle like this to keep its cameras aimed only at what appears to be pertinent.

MUSIC

Alternative merits

Popular Songs. Written and performed by Clive Robertson. Available through The Record Peddler, 115 Queen St E, Toronto M5C 1S1.

This collection of nine songs by Toronto-based artist and writer Clive Robertson addresses a number of subjects more common than popular. Patriarchal dominance, media manipulation, police harassment, unemployment, inflation — Robertson's concerns are hardly the material of a hit record. But they are the stuff of our lives. That the album has been reviewed more than it has been played is an irony its title anticipates. Produced on a shoestring budget outside the corporate record industry, Popular Songs acknowledges its sub-cultural position by flaunting its anti-commercial attitudes in a no-frills package. It is marginal music, written for and about people who experience the anger and enervation of oppression.

Robertson's use of the song format to explore the reasons and manifestations of powerlessness in our society make him an easy target for musical and political purists. Complicated issues rarely make for easy listening; when they do, they invariably suffer from oversimplification. Popular Songs is vulnerable on both counts. Robertson's attempt to reduce the concept of hegemony to two-and-a-half minutes, for example, is inevitably problematic. How do you turn political theory into a catchy tune? Some will say you shouldn't even try, that the result will demean the idea, deaden the song, or both. And do we really want to dance to a ditty about the

Robertson: common, if not popular, concerns

Toronto bath raids, entitled "No More Shit"? Are we not defusing our anger and diluting our politics no matter what the musical quality?

I think not. The co-opting of minority and sub-cultural groups by mass culture is a process as old as slavery. As we watch our lovemaking fill the nation's cinemas, this process appears all too benign. In such a climate, art that asserts its oppositional status by remaining a deliberate alternative to the structures of mainstream culture serves a valuable political purpose. Popular Songs, if only because of its problems, reminds us of the merits of being different and "difficult."

Listen for it. In a culture where familiarity breeds content, what you don't hear matters.

Confusing life, art, history and Oscar Wilde

Lord Alfred's Lover, a play by Eric Bentley. Personal Library (439-17 Queen St E, Toronto, M5C 1P9), 1981. $6.95.

Oscar Wilde should have a special significance for gay men and women, one linking his name to the development of liberation struggles and gay consciousness. Yet, until the publication of this play (with the dubious exception of Lord Alfred Douglas's viciously self-serving autobiography), there has been no important examination of Wilde's life and times informed by a gay sensibility.

Bentley brings undeniably impressive credentials to his task, as a scholar, playwright and democratic socialist (he pays tribute to Wilde's essay "The Soul of Man Under Socialism" in the preface to this work). Like many of us, he seems to feel an affinity with Wilde as both artist and as the eventual martyr in a struggle Wilde himself predicted would be "long and red with monstrous martyrdoms." But it is a pity that so little has resulted from Bentley's efforts. Lord Alfred's Lover does little to illuminate or explain its subject's success or the forces which carried him to an early and ignoble end.

It would be inappropriate to comment here on the performance potential of the play (to be performed in New York later this year, with Quentin Crisp in the cast), but read as either a work of biography or imagination it is a disappointment.

Designed as a reminiscence and confession by Douglas at the end of his life in 1945, the play telescopes the last nine years of Wilde's life, from his meeting with Lord Alfred in 1891 to his exile in Paris after serving a two-year sentence for committing acts of "gross indecency." Much of the dialogue is taken from the writings of Wilde and others, which may lend an impression of authenticity but which does not, unfortunately, produce a work of historical accuracy: the play is rife with errors, most of them, it must be assumed, intentional.

For example, Douglas's confession of his affair with Wilde can scarcely have been revelatory in 1945, since by that time he had been gradually revealing the truth and correcting his lies for about twenty years. And unlike the play's version of events, Douglas was not in London when his father left the famous calling card at Wilde's club accusing him of posing as a sodomite, and so Wilde's initial anger and decision to bring suit was made without his lover's encouragement. Such inaccuracies would matter less if they were committed in the service of a greater truth, an artist's insight into a complex man's character. But Bentley covers much while revealing little.

He hurries the action along with a series of brief scenes until he arrives at the dénouement, the one big scene which seems to be the raison d'être for the work. Set in Reading Gaol, it depicts a visit by the Prime Minister, Lord Rosebery (a fictitious event, of course). Rosebery comes to announce the government's decision not to rescind the remainder of Wilde's sentence, despite his repentance. He also wants to explain to Wilde why he is suffering humiliation and imprisonment. Rosebery is in the play to speak the author's message: Bentley apparently believes that Wilde's crime was not sodomy but his challenge to bourgeois morality and therefore the bourgeois state, and that this challenge had to be met by the state's impersonal, overwhelming power, marshalled by official defenders of a faith who do not practice this morality themselves. Rosebery was, Bentley contends, a closet homosexual.

There is a modicum of truth in all this, but not enough to support the polemical energy of this work or to warrant such manipulation of historical materials. Rather than clamping down on Wilde like a trap, Her Majesty's government acted only after Wilde declined to avail himself of a delay sufficient to allow a retreat to France before the warrant for his arrest was issued.

More importantly, Wilde was the chief engineer of his own destruction, as when, with self-dramatizing recklessness, he sued Queensberry for libel. Long before, Wilde had carefully exhibited a cavalier indifference to public opinion about his morals. He was not punished for the relationship that Lord Alfred's father found so objectionable, but for consorting with working class youths, thus violating the Victorian rules and openly flouting class divisions. A man who sat in cafés with telegraph boys and unemployed valets drinking champagne should have known better than to ask society to validate his honour. But on the eve of his lawsuit, Wilde told a friend not to worry because "the working classes are with me — to a boy." Was this insouciance knowing or blind?

It has been suggested more than once that his excesses were related to his aesthetic creed, which stressed the value of intense experiences, the worship of beautiful forms and "creative deceptions." Did he confuse his life and his art, or simply refuse to acknowledge a distinction? He once wrote: "What the paradox was to me in the sphere of thought, perversity became to me in the sphere of passion."

This Wilde doesn't seem to interest Bentley. His Wilde is too much the tool of the author's argument. Oscar Wilde remains to be captured by a gay writer.

Uncovering a forgotten Canadian gay film—from 1965

The first gay movie from English Canada is not an obscure museum piece, but a fine dramatic feature that played to festival acclaim around the world in 1965. It is now forgotten.

Winter Kept Us Warm was made on a shoestring at the University of Toronto by David Secter, a 22-year-old English major from Winnipeg. It wasn't easy. After student council money launched the filming of Secter's script of an "ambiguous" (as they used to say in the Sixties) male friendship in a campus residence, finishing grants were predictably refused by the Canada Council, the Ontario Arts Council and the National Film Board.

But Secter persisted and went on to prove the bureaucrats wrong. The critics loved it, despite its black-and-white "Canadian" aura and its forbidden theme (which some even acknowledged in print). After Winter's splash at the 1965 Cannes Festival, a French critic wondered whether Secter, this "jeune chien fou" from Toronto, would soon outpace his Quebec counterparts, who were at that time the toasts of Paris.

It was not to be. After a modest release in the art houses and campuses across North America, Winter Kept Us Warm disappeared from the screens and the history books. Secter's hopes seemed permanently dashed the following year with the failure of a second feature, an intercultural heterosexual love story.

Three years later it is 1969: Stonewall erupts, the University of Toronto sees its first homophile association and the Canadian Film Development Corporation has begun its mission of ushering Canadian movies into the world of economic survival. But David Secter doesn't wait; he moves to New York for a second career as a theatrical producer.

Winter still looks good today. It is sad but strong, rough-edged but movingly tender and honest. To see it is to rediscover not only an unjustly neglected Canadian film, but also a poignant moment in gay history — an image from those winters in Toronto that we must never forget. □

Winter: The finest sequence of the film shows Peter and Doug romping in shirtsleeves across the new-fallen snow of the residence quadrangle, chasing squirrels and exulting in the innocence of quickie hugs and caresses. As the film progresses, the physicality of their friendship grows, from jock-style handshakes and back-slapping to the half-drunk arm-over-the-shoulder routine and even, at one point, a furtive peck on the cheek. But when Peter finally gets laid (as they used to say on campus in 1965), it's with Sandra, not Doug, and Doug angrily and confusedly realizes that it's all over. The springtime brings distrust and rejection, with Doug awakening to something he will not be able to suppress anymore.

Pink triangles: Doug (centre, in photo at right) sizes up Sandra, his rival for Peter's affection who wins out in the end. For some years, the triangle has been a basic formula of the gay feature, two loving men and the heterosexual woman who either comes between them or gets left out.

Do the "three's-a-crowd" stories express a misogynist myth about our alleged misogyny, or simply part of our reality as gay men, many with heterosexual pasts and strong friendships with straight women? Or are they just an index of the overwhelmingly straight market at which big-budget films aim? Whatever the case, among Winter's many virtues are the relative integrity of the two women characters and the clarity with which the film exposes the degrading and sexist courtship games that were (and still are?) part of male undergraduate culture.

OVERTURNING EXPECTATIONS: As Sight and Sound's Richard Roud noticed, "it is the womanising older boy who falls desperately — and unrequitedly — in love with the younger one," providing a "(stunning) moment when all of a sudden one realises that one has got it all wrong, that something quite different is happening up there on the screen, but that that something is nevertheless completely convincing and right."

To please the Finnish-Canadian Peter (above, at the window), Doug learns a Finnish folksong, "Far Away is My Love," on his guitar and sings it staring intently into Peter's eyes. Doug's "steady girlfriend" Bev, who is present, squirms with embarrassment; the audience squirms with admiration. □

Fantasies from the closet: Not one but two steamy bathing scenes of male intimacy and sensuality — the first (top) in a Finnish sauna when Peter is sharing his ethnic heritage with his new friend; the second in a campus locker room where a towel-snapping scene with the whole residence gang leads to Doug helping Peter wash those hard-to-reach areas of his back.

The classic setting for closet gay eroticism. Think of all the filmmakers who have been attracted to, terrified by — or otherwise engaged with — inter-male sexuality and who have resorted to the old rub-a-dub-dub formula to exorcise or covertly celebrate desires for which the script has no room. The basic bath list: Visconti (The Damned; Death in Venice; Ludwig; The Innocent), Pasolini (Accatone; Canterbury Tales; Arabian Nights), Lindsay Anderson (This Sporting Life; If), Hector Babenco (Pixote), Fred Schepisi (The Devil's Playground), R.W. Fassbinder (Fox and his Friends; Ali: Fear Eats the Soul), and an interesting current Hollywood representative, James Bridges (The Paper Chase; Urban Cowboy).

John Labow, the student actor who played Doug, now a TV Ontario producer, remembers no discussion whatsoever of the gay theme of the film; for him and the rest of the overwhelmingly straight cast and crew, Winter was about heterosexual male friendship. Director-writer Secter remembers otherwise. Regardless of who was kidding whom, Secter himself knew exactly what was going on. For him, Winter was deeply personal, autobiographical even, the probing of a reality that was still unspoken at the U of T in the mid-Sixties. It was so unspoken, in fact, that the gay element had to be soft-pedalled to ensure campus support. Even so, some administrators saw through the discretion of a script that never stated the obvious (even today, Personal Best says "fuck" and "pussy," but never "lesbian"), and denied permission to use locations under their jurisdiction. But, looking back from a post-Stonewall vantage point seventeen years later, Winter's tactical coyness is overwhelmed by its more fundamental honesty.

The Great Canadian one-shot queer flick

There is a whole Canadian film genre, as Canadian Forum's Peter Harcourt recently commented, of feature films about young people, by young people. The directors have been promising neophytes who have been given a chance to direct because of the erratic conditions of film production in this country, but who have either not been permitted or able to build on their one-shot achievement with any consistency or integrity.

While many of these quintessentially Canadian youth movies are about alienated straight men in a state of prolonged adolescence, what Harcourt did not notice is that a surprisingly high proportion of them are about gays, by gays, or express a gay sensibility. (There are even a few about lesbians.)

This sub-list is impressive, but sad because so few of these often widely praised works have been widely seen or substantially followed up: alongside

Winter Kept Us Warm, think of Outrageous! (Richard Benner, 1977), Fortune and Men's Eyes (Harvey Hart, 1971), Montreal Main (Frank Vitale, 1974), The Rubber Gun (Allan Moyle, 1977); about lesbians there are August and July (Murray Markowitz, 1972), By Design (Claude Jutra, 1981) and P4W: Prison for Women (Holly Dale and Janis Cole, 1981); from Quebec, there are Il était une fois dans l'Est (André Brassard/Michel Tremblay, 1974) and A tout prendre (Claude Jutra, 1963).

If we can surmise why such films were never followed up, the question remains how they ever got made in the first place. Are there so many simply because a highly subsidized film industry, colonized and marginalized by Famous Players and the other arms of the Hollywood monopolies, doesn't have enough energy or coherence to be systematically homophobic? □ commitment to each other, had been sought by a major studio, but Rule was afraid the theme would be exploited by them. Desert Heart Productions can be contacted at 1524 Cloverfield Blvd, Santa Monica, CA 90404.

Winter Kept Us Warm is available from the Canadian Filmmakers Distribution Centre, 144 Front Street W, Toronto, ON M5J 2L7. Thanks for assistance with the article to David Secter, John Labow, the Audio-Visual Department of Concordia University and David Poole.

• Miss Fit? Dept: After receiving objections from tennis star Billie Jean King about the title of her autobiography (to be released in June), Viking Press has changed it from Misfit to Billie Jean. King had been out of the country and was not consulted when the promotion for the book, co-written with Frank Deford, was launched. The book does touch upon the nonconformist role King had to play when growing up and when trying to get ahead in the male-dominated tennis world, but King felt the title would be seen as applying to her entire life. A double page ad in Publishers Weekly January 8 also had King describing herself as "that pushy, loud-mouthed, paranoid bull-dyke, with fat legs and bad eyes..." and King has asked that that sentence, which was edited from final manuscript of the book, be dropped as well.

• Good Fairy Productions, "Songs of Changing Men," is announcing two extensive projects. The Seattle-based collective has organized a local concert series throughout May and June, which will draw upon such talents as Charlie Murphy, David Sereda and Chris Tanner. They have also formed a mail order service with, at present, a dozen records of "alternative men's music" available. Good Fairy can be contacted at Box 12188, Seattle, WA 98102.

• Vancouverites will experience Bloopers, the out-of-this-world gender-fuck theatre group, at the Vancouver East Cultural Centre, May 12-29.

Shared Ground

Second waves and self-publishing

Shared Ground is only three months old and already the volume of mail I receive from publishers and magazine collectives is unbelievable. Thank you to all the women who have shown an interest in Shared Ground and have sent in periodicals and books to be reviewed.

I received a very encouraging letter from Laurie Knight and the Second Wave Collective in Cambridge, Massachusetts, along with a copy of the tenth anniversary issue of Second Wave (Vol 6, No 1). Since it first appeared, the magazine has gained quite a reputation. Its pages have reflected battles over lesbian rights, abortion, daycare, racism and the patriarchal system. However, with economics the way they are, Second Wave needs help. The anniversary issue contains fine examples of the good work offered in Second Wave. In "Notes From Just Over the Edge: A New Lesbian Speaks Out," a woman (who must remain anonymous due to custody considerations) writes about first coming out, about her love for women and her painful glimpses into the oppression many lesbians have had to carry all the years of their lives. Almost every lesbian has, at some time, experienced what the author describes: the newness of the feelings, the power of being honest with one's own sexuality, the energy a woman feels the first time she finds herself in a room full of other lesbians. In "Triptych," three short fiction pieces, Judith Treewoman describes the trauma felt by a woman who loves women but can't express her love and the experience of wanting women but fucking men to work one's self through the maze of one's sexuality. Treewoman also details the problems of political correctness and describes the pain we inflict on ourselves by being dishonest with one another. Second Wave also contains poetry, book reviews and political features as well as photography and graphics.

I also received word from Broadsheet, New Zealand's feminist magazine. Reading through Broadsheet proves that our problems are international: an article on pornography by Andrea Dworkin, advice on how to discuss your lesbianism with your children, notices for the local rape-crisis centre. One item that drew my attention was a feminist fairy tale called "Once there was a beautiful, strong, gentle, wild young woman," by eleven-year-old Rachel Sutton, complete with a princess who loves archery, running and her kitchen maid. The women win their freedom from the mean old King, who locks them up, by beating all the men in the kingdom with their archery skills. They run away to other kingdoms to gather together all the amazing women they can find. Broadsheet should appeal to readers who want a look at women's lives from an international perspective.

Many women who try unsuccessfully to get their work published are turning to self-publication. Despite financial constraints, many of these self-published books are well designed. But not all of them are well written. You've Got to Ride the Subway, by Madge Reinhardt, Back Row Press, 1803 Venus Ave, St Paul, MN 55112. Paperback $5.50. ISBN 0-917162-02-1.

The subtitle reads, "a sort of feminism," and the story continues in this indecisive manner. It is about a multi-talented but fanatically religious housewife who leaves home and falls in love with a woman, cruises bars and tries to be a lesbian — but isn't; she attempts to rid herself of her husband's oppression — but doesn't; and she ends up preferring silence to the struggle necessary to become a whole person. This book was "sort of banned in Boston," according to the publisher, but I'm still looking for something in it that would warrant censorship. The design of the book is reminiscent of bound printer's galley proofs and the hand-doodled front cover is also second-rate. You've Got to Ride the Subway is an example of the unpolished work that vanity presses sometimes produce.

A Wild Patience Has Taken Me This Far is a new collection of poetry by Adrienne Rich. Rich continues to search for a "common language" and writes poetry that conjures up the spirit of women of the past, writers and artists and the poet's own grandmothers. She attempts to find ways to link these women to us so that we can gather strength from the vast matriarchal history behind us. "For Julia in Nebraska," a poem written in tribute to Willa Cather, demonstrates Rich's search for connections:

Rich: strength through a common language

In the Midwest of Willa Cather
the railroad looks like a braid of hair grandmother's strong hands plaited down a grand-daughter's back.

A Wild Patience is not a small-press publication, but it provides an excellent showing of the craft of Adrienne Rich. □

The Second Wave, Box 344, Cambridge A, Cambridge, MA 02139. Four issues, $12.00 US.

Broadsheet, Box 5799, Wellesley Street, Auckland, New Zealand. Monthly, $15.00. You've Got to Ride the Subway, by Madge Reinhardt. Back Row Press, 1803 Venus Ave, St Paul, MN 55112. Paperback $5.50. ISBN 0-917162-02-1.

Who was Charlotte Bach?

Some readers may remember my previous mentions of the work of British theorist Charlotte Bach and her colleagues Bob Mellors and Don Smith. Mellors and Smith are both gay activists, and Mellors was one of the founders of Britain's Gay Liberation Front in the early '70s. Bach was a Hungarian-born psychologist who, in a series of lectures and bulky privately-printed tracts, developed a meandering set of questions, speculations and theories about human character types, sexual variations (she called them "deviations") and the nature of human evolution. Her work dealt extensively with homosexuality: an important question for her was "Why has homosexuality survived? Why hasn't evolution eliminated it thousands of years ago?" She gave her theories the label "Human Ethology," and her small movement was beginning to attract attention when she died suddenly last year.

At the time of her death, Bach's own theoretical book and two other books about her and her ideas were moving towards publication. The well-known novelist and writer on psychology and philosophy Colin Wilson was also about to publish a major article on Bach's theories. Bach's unexpected death might, in the ordinary way, have stimulated interest in her ideas. As it happened, it has resulted in a good deal of embarrassment. For on her death, it was revealed that Charlotte Bach was a man.

Born in Hungary shortly after the First World War, Carl Bach, alias Michael Karoly, alias Michael Hadju, apparently graduated in philosophy and psychology before joining the SS during the Second War. Bob Mellors, in a recent article in the British magazine Forum, writes, "Although Charlotte wrote about seeing people tortured and watching executions, what part he played in all this is obscure. Certainly, after the war... Carl was imprisoned for several months. Eventually he got away to England.... As a man Carl had married and gained a stepson. For over ten years the family prospered in London. Then, suddenly, the wife died in an emergency operation and two weeks later the son, then aged 19, was killed in a car crash." It was after this double tragedy that Carl's previous transvestite tendencies "returned with a vengeance.... Friends who visited him or her were never quite sure who was going to open the door," Mellors writes. "After a while, Charlotte simply never changed back."

While Bach was experimenting with dress reform, Michael Karoly worked as a consulting psychologist in Mayfair and wrote articles for the popular press. Soon, Charlotte/Michael began to advertise — for people involved in transvestism, fetishism, S/M and other sexual experiences. Employing the name and personality of "Mrs Daphne Lyell-Manson," she became sexually involved with some of these people, who paid her for the privilege. Sometimes, according to Mellors, she asked her clients for samples of their pornography — "an invaluable research tool." Before long, Charlotte had set herself up as a "spanking madam" (one of many in London), and it was in that capacity that she began to gather the "research notes" from which her later writings grew.

While she was alive, even her close colleagues such as Mellors and Smith apparently did not suspect she was a man (though she was six feet tall, with broad shoulders and a deep voice); they were as surprised as anyone when the truth came out. The revelations have been taken in stride by Bach's gay followers, but not by the publishers about to solemnly issue their respective tomes on Human Ethology and its august founder. They are not quite sure how to proceed in the light of the latest news.

Bob Mellors concludes his fascinating article on Bach, "No Sin Unsinned," with even more scandal. "It has to be said," he writes, "that there is a dark side to Charlotte's life.... As I've said, he was probably in the SS. In 1956 he was accused of embezzling funds collected for freedom fighters in Hungary. She was a shoplifter and petty thief. He was imprisoned twice for debt. Her dealings with her clients as a spanking madam were sometimes less than scrupulous. In later life, she had a boyfriend who took her to the pictures once a week — then she got a colour telly and ditched him! The catalogue could go on.

"All in all," he concludes, "she beat the devil at his own game."

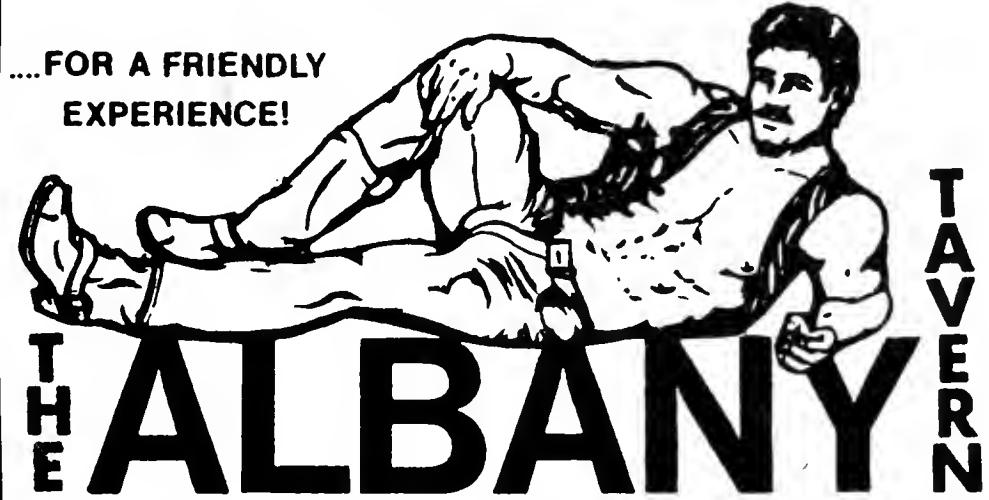

Anyone interested in Charlotte's life or work or obtaining pamphlets on Human Ethology or a reprint of Mellors' article should write to Another Orbit Press, 5 Caledonian Road, London N1, England. Please enclose enough to cover postage and photocopying costs.

Larry Townsend is a prolific author of gay erotic novels, many of them with S/M content. The best of these, published in 1971, was The Long Leather Cord, a hot and heavy mystery story about a pair of young gay brothers whose kinky dad may or may not be a murderer. The book's original publisher, who shall be nameless — Greenleaf Classics — issued it in a somewhat truncated version. Now Townsend has published the complete text as a magazine-size paperback about 18 pages of photos sure to please readers who like cute & hunky young guys, or bondage, or both. A worthwhile collector's item, it's $10.95 from Box 302, Beverly Hills, CA 90213. And those who enjoyed Townsend's The Leatherman's Handbook will be happy to know that a sequel is in the works!

The answer to the last contest question was Chris Robison. Copies of David Sereda's Chivalry Lives album go to Dave Hingsburger of Toronto and Walter Phillips of New York. □

GWM, 30, GOOD-LOOKING, wheelchair-bound with cerebral palsy, seeks sexual relief. Private apartment downtown. Experience with disabled unnecessary, will teach. A/P french, JO. Not keen on greek. Revealing letter, phone number, photo if possible. Scott. Drawer C802.

AFFECTIONATE GWM, 28, 5'6" 130 lbs, honest, intelligent and romantic. Moving to Toronto and seeking friends who are under 30, slim and sincere. Photo and phone appreciated. Drawer C717.

ARE YOU LIKE ME? Alone and fed up cruising and one-night stands. I am a 45-year-old GWM, average-looking who seeks a strictly one-to-one relationship with a big/husky hirsute butch type male with a view to living together. Two can live cheaper than one. I am honest, sincere and reliable. Out-of-town replies invited. Drawer C804.

I HAVE A DREAM that everybody lives happily. Will my dream come true? Handsome, masculine, sincere, honest guys please answer. I am 26, oriental, educated, mature and monogamist. Box 5796, Station A, Toronto, ON M5W 1P2.

ATTRACTIVE HAIRY MASCULINE male collects and wears silky nylon lingerie. Would like to meet

GOOD-LOOKING GUY, 41, active, healthy, physically fit, loves the outdoors, outdoor activities and sports: swimming, canoeing, camping, kayaking, skiing, cycling, back-packing, nature study, bridge, movies and the arts; am seeking a close relationship with another masculine guy, either gay or bisexual, who shares these interests. My goal is to build a log home northwest of Metro, and live a simple, conservation-type lifestyle. Surely there is another guy out there who shares this dream. Box 290, Station M, Toronto, M6S 4T3.

IF YOU ARE A REAL SLAVE with a high pain threshold digging a rough fantasy trip, if you enjoy being slapped across the face, the bite of the belt on your ass, being put in bondage and abused, then be prepared to act. This is no sissy stuff. Total submission is the limit. I am 32, attractive, well-built. Got my head well together. Only explicit letter of your capacity and description gets reply. Age or race irrelevant if you are slim and well-built. Marc, Box 100-385, 2 Bloor St W, Toronto ON M4W 3E2.

PROFESSIONAL ATTRACTIVE GWM 30, tired of bars and attitude of Toronto men. Looking for attractive man interested in theatre, sports, travel. Someone who enjoys sharing quiet times with special person. There must be interesting men out there who want more than a one-night stand and who have a positive attitude toward themselves. You are 25-38, sincere, intelligent professional, honest, sensitive and seeking relationship with caring man. Please provide detailed response. Drawer C811.

OUTDOORSMAN, PERSONABLE, thirtyish, seeks younger brother who doesn't do his camping on Yonge Street. Adventure, travel, employment possible. Discretion assured. Drawer C809.

ATTRACTIVE GWM, 32, physically, socially, emotionally well together, masculine, easygoing, sincere. Tired of cheating myself sexually, wants to meet same to fulfill unconditional fantasies. I am ready to explore anything as top or bottom with adventurous man. We decide our limits together. No bullshit could lead to complete "ownership" of each other. If compatible nothing can be too far. I am into everything related to: S/M, heavy B&D, CBTT, enema, complete ass work, F and G active/passive, WS, blindfold, toys, humiliation, confinement, abuse, smoke, poppers, spanking, jockey shorts, role-playing, fantasy trips, shaving (FF?) and anything kinky or unusual. Scat and mutilation are out. Cleanliness and respect are in. You are slender, well-built (boyish looking, little hair a plus) masculine acting and looking. Direct, uninhibited. Detailed letter and photo (returned) a must. Box 100-385, 2 Bloor St W, Toronto, ON M4W 3E2.

CLASSIFIED INFORMATION

Welcome to TBP classifieds — gay people out to meet other gay people, right across Canada and beyond our borders too.

Cost. Just 25¢ per word, minimum charge $5.00. Business ads: 50¢ per word, minimum charge $10.00, or call 977-6320 between 3:00 pm and 5:00 pm, Monday to Friday, for reasonable display rates.

You can save if you subscribe. Body Politic subscribers: you can deduct $1.00 from the cost of your ad.

You can save if you repeat your ad. New discount system: 15% off for 2 runs, 20% off for 3 to 4 runs, 25% off for 5 to 9 runs, and 30% for 10 runs or more.

Conditions. All ads should be fully prepaid by cheque, money order or charge card, and mailed to arrive before the advertised deadline. Late ads will be held over for the following issue, unless you instruct otherwise.

We cannot accept ads over the telephone.

If you do not wish to print your address or phone number, you can request a drawer number. We will forward replies to you every week in a plain envelope. This service costs $2.50 per ad per issue.

Replies to your drawer cannot be picked up at our office.

Gay sex is still illegal if either or both parties are under 21, or if more than 2 people are involved, regardless of their ages. Please word your ad accordingly. We reserve the right to alter or refuse any ad.

Remember, too, your ad is reaching other people, not just a box number. So it's smart to be positive about yourself, not insulting to others. We will edit out phrases like "no blacks" or "no fats or fems."

Answering an ad. No charge — just put your reply in an envelope and address it as in the diagram. Be sure the drawer number is on the outside of the envelope. Office staff do not open any mail addressed to a drawer.

How to do it. Write one word per box. The amount in the box when you finish is the basic cost of your ad. Mail your ad along with your payment to us at: TBP CLASSIFIEDS, Box 7289, Station A, Toronto, ON M5W 1X9.

DOUBLE JEOPARDY!!

A game of legal legerdemain!!
Costs only $80,000!! (so far...)
Takes years to play!!

START

November 1971:
Form a collective to publish a gay liberation magazine — any number can play!

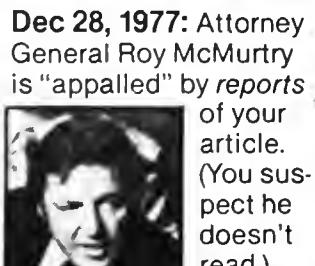

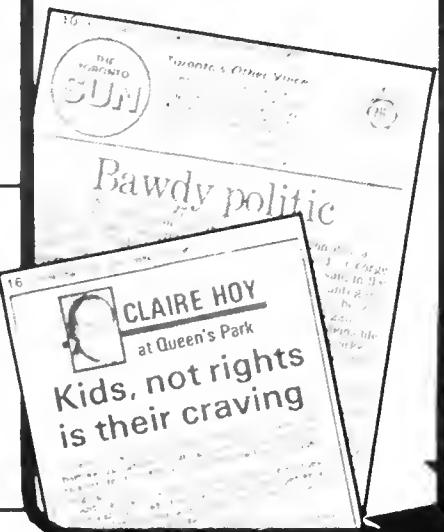

July 1975:
Incorporate as Pink Triangle Press. Choose three players to serve as nominal directors.

Publish 38 issues through October 1977.

Nov 21, 1977:
Publish Issue 39, a review of the major themes of the year. Include an article on Anita Bryant's favourite subject. Call it "Men Loving Boys Loving Men"

Dec 22-27, 1977:
Toronto Sun columnist and notorious homophobe Claire Hoy attacks you for "promoting child abuse." The Sun editorializes against you.

Dec 27, 1977:
Get nervous! (but give 'em hell)
Issue a press release denying Hoy's charges and defending your right to discuss controversial issues. Hire the city's best civil rights lawyer.

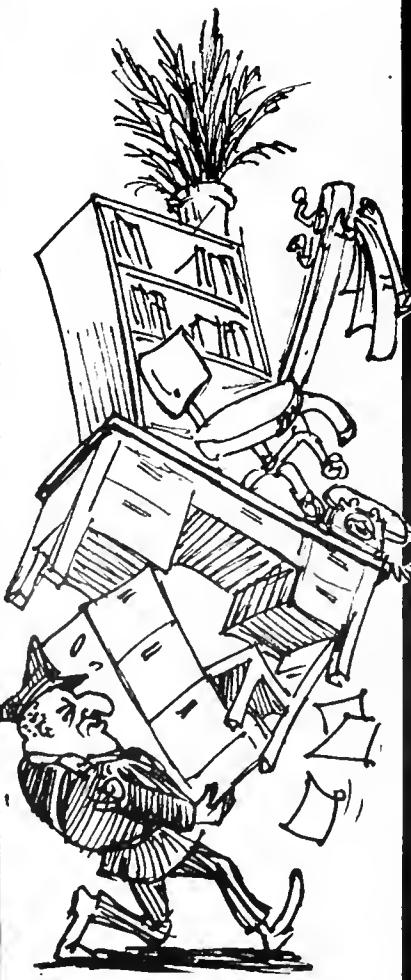

RAID!
Dec 30, 1977: Five police officers search your office for 3½ hours.

Apr 24, 1978:
The police give you permission to copy your material at their office — for a fee.

Mar 23, 1978:
The Body Politic Free the Press Fund holds a demo at McMurtry's office, demanding return of the materials. (Somehow, it doesn't work.)

Dec 30, 1977:
The five cops from Operation P (the joint provincial/municipal police porn squad) carry off 12 cartons of business records, manuscripts and subscription lists. Send off one player to get it all back.

Dec 31, 1977:
Hold a press conference with lawyer Clayton Ruby denouncing raid as an attack on freedom of the press and an attempt to intimidate the gay community.

Jan 1-4, 1978:
Get support! GATE Vancouver becomes the first group to demonstrate against the raid. Other groups and public figures protest as well.

DEAD END
Proceed to July 12, 1978

July 18, 1978:
Appointment with destiny: A date for trial is set: January 2, 1979. Start looking for witnesses.

July 12, 1978:
Church and State dig for witnesses: Anti-porn priest Brad Massman asks MCC pastor Brent Hawkes to testify against you. He refuses.

Feb 4, 1978:
Supporters donate more than $10,000 in just one month.

Feb 3, 1978:
Alive & Kicking! You publish Issue 40 — 3 weeks late. The Fund holds a benefit showing of Word Is Out.

Jan 24-27, 1978:
In San Francisco, Harvey Milk calls for a tourist boycott of English Canada; supporters demonstrate at Canada House in London.

Jan 14, 1978:
Anita Bryant comes to town; community demonstrates against her — and in support of your right to publish.

CHARGES!

Jan 5, 1978:
The Press and its directors (you 3 lucky players!) are charged under Sec 164 of the Criminal Code (mailing "indecent, immoral or scurrilous" material).

Jan 4, 1978:
Get money! Form The Body Politic Free the Press Fund; send a letter to your subscribers and friends seeking support.

$ Aug 26, 1978: The Fund has collected $24,000 — and spent $15,000. Witnesses: You get sexologist John Money, journalist June Callwood; they get homophobe Hoy & fundamentalist Ken Campbell.

THE JOY OF GAY SEX

...copies of The Joy of Gay Sex and The Joy of Lesbian Sex — held for 8 months, though never under charge.

TRIAL

Jan 2, 1979: Trial begins before Provincial Court Judge Sydney Harris.

Jan 3, 1979: Local artists perform at a benefit for you; Toronto Mayor John Sewell speaks in defence of the gay community. The media go crazy.

Jan 2-8, 1979: In six days of testimony, the Crown presents none of the seized material — except one copy of Issue 39 — as evidence.

May 31, 1982: Retrial begins. You've got your community and your witnesses behind you — but what about the judge?

$ Dec 31, 1981: Fund has raised $67,800 — spent $56,000. Relax? Well, you'll need $18,000 more to cover retrial...

Dec 21, 1981: Re-appointment with destiny: Date for retrial is set: May 31, 1982.

DEAD END
Proceed to Mar 6, 1979

Feb 19, 1979: You serve notice of intent to sue, but get nasty reactions from the media and your community. You cool off and let the idea die....

Feb 16, 1979: Get litigious! The Star prints a tiny correction — and an editorial based on their own false story, calling you "truculent" and "provocative." You decide to sue.

Mar 15, 1982: County Court grants the Crown their appeal, letting them hold onto the material.

YOU LOSE!

Mar 16, 1982: Gather all players for consultation. Discuss whether to proceed any further with court action to get materials back. With a retrial date already set, you speculate you won't have much luck. You decide not to.

DEAD END
Proceed to retrial

Mar 26, 1981: Gather all players for consultation: Deliberate on whether to try to appeal the Court of Appeal decision to — trumpet fanfare here — THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA!

Jan 2, 1979: Trial begins before Provincial Court Judge Sydney Harris.

Jan 3, 1979: Local artists perform at a benefit for you; Toronto Mayor John Sewell speaks in defence of the gay community. The media go crazy.

Feb 14, 1979: Judge Harris delivers his verdict: NOT GUILTY!

YOU WIN!
PROCEED TO NEXT BOX

Apr 11, 1979: Finders keepers: Despite your acquittal, the Crown refuses to return the material; they say they'll need it for the retrial....

Oct 26, 1979: Judge Harris (acting as a Justice of the Peace) hears your application for a court order forcing the Crown to return your records.

Feb 15, 1979: The Toronto Star reports your acquittal in a front-page story with a misleading headline (You say it means "Now kiss our ungrateful bums, Body Politic says"). Send one player off to scream at the editor.

Feb 16, 1979: Get litigious! The Star prints a tiny correction — and an editorial based on their own false story, calling you "truculent" and "provocative." You decide to sue.

Feb 2, 1982: Finally... County Court hears the Crown's appeal of Judge Harris's decision. (You wonder why they could still want all that old stuff.)

BUT...
Jan 21, 1980: The Crown announces it will appeal Judge Harris's decision — and until the appeal is heard, they'll keep the stuff.

Special dice (well, one die) included. Remember: you can only move one step at a time...

YOU LOSE!

Mar 25, 1981: The Ontario Court of Appeal upholds the County Court decision. Which means:

YOU LOSE!

Mar 4, 1981: The Ontario Court of Appeal hears your appeal of the County Court decision granting the Crown's appeal (still with us?) of your acquittal.

SUN

Mar 3, 1981: Loose talk: McMurtry says in the Toronto Sun that gay leaders are "bent on confrontation." He means you: he mentions "Men Loving Boys Loving Men."

BUT...
Mar 6, 1979: The Crown appeals: Attorney General McMurtry, citing "errors of law" in decision, seeks to overturn your acquittal.

$ Mar 31, 1979: The Fund has collected $32,000 — but spent $33,500. PANIC!

W We urge the Attorney-General of Ontario to drop the appeal against The Body Politic.

Feb 6, 1980: Fund gets 800 signatures and $9,500 for a huge ad in the Globe and Mail urging McMurtry to drop his appeal.

Feb 7-8, 1980: County Court hears Crown appeal of your acquittal. The Canadian Civil Liberties Association speaks on your behalf, claiming that Sec 164 violates the Bill of Rights.

DEAD END
Proceed to Mar 25, 1981

Mar 4, 1981: The Court rejects your arguments — and makes you pay the Sun's and the Crown's costs!

YOU LOSE!

Mar 4, 1981: The Court of Appeal hears your case. The Crown attorney says you are being contemptuous....

Mar 3, 1981: You see the article as an attempt to influence justice. Send off one player to have McMurtry and the Sun cited for contempt of court.

Mar 3, 1981: Loose talk: McMurtry says in the Toronto Sun that gay leaders are "bent on confrontation." He means you: he mentions "Men Loving Boys Loving Men."

$ Dec 31, 1980: The Fund has raised $53,600 — spent $46,000. RELAX.

THE CANADIAN BILL OF RIGHTS

Very pretty, but...

Mar 7, 1980: County Court agrees with the Crown, overturns your acquittal and orders a new trial. In other words:

YOU LOSE!

Mar 7, 1980: You can play this game, too: You appeal the County Court decision to the Ontario Court of Appeals.

There's a cheaper way to get that long-distance feeling.

Just about all of us in Toronto have old friends scattered across the country, friends we want to stay in touch with, if only just to say hello.

Calling is expensive. But we have a cheap and easy way to say hello from Toronto once a month: a free introductory subscription to The Body Politic.

All you have to do is fill in the other side of this card and mail it to us. The only thing you have to pay for is that one postage stamp — we'll cover the rest. As soon as we hear from you, we'll start a free, six-issue subscription for each of your friends, starting with the very next one. And we'll include a note saying it's from you.

So, why not take a minute and say hello?
